Deficit Estimate by Congress Is Far Larger Than Reagan's

WASHINGTON - The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted Friday that next year's federal deficit will be $157 billion — well above administration fore-casts — unless Congress cuts spending or increases revenue.

The budget office projection for fiscal year 1983, starting next Oct. fiscal year 1983, starting near out.

1, was released three days before President Reagan was due to make his official budget proposal. Mr. Resgan's budget message, to be sent to Congress Monday, is expected to project a deficit in the syn-billion range.

In documents released Friday, the budget office emphasized that its fiscal 1983 projection "represents what might happen to the budget if no changes in current law or policies were made." But that is not Mr. Reagan's plan.

$109.5 Estimate The president is expected to pro-pose reducing nondefense federal spending by an additional $31 bil-lion in fiscal 1983 without asking for any major tax increases. The budget office said the increase in the fiscal 1982 budget projection is due largely to last year's overly optimistic economic assumptions, sharp increases in unemployment and reduced inflation, which affects the amount of taxes the sovernment collects.

Jobless Rate in U.S. Shows Surprise Decline

WASHINGTON - The U.S. unemployment rate unexpectedly fell to 8.5 percent in January from 8.8 percent in December, the La-bor Department said Friday, but analysts said the decline did not signal a significant improvement.

Congress is supposed to pass another version of the final 1982 budget resolution, which sets bind-ing ceilings for spending, because its pre-Christmas version was simply a copy of its first resolution, with no adjustments for economic

And in a preliminary skirmish to the spending battles that will begin in earnest when Mr. Reagan submits his fiscal 1983 budget, the House Appropriations Committee approved Thursday nearly $10 billion in supplemental appropria-tions for this year. Included were $2.3 billion in unemployment aid that the administration wanted and $123 million in low-income fuel assistance that it opposed.

trend of the future."

Meanwhile, the Reagan administration, in a vote of confidence for Mr. Mubarak, is granting Egypt greater control over its $1-billion U.S. economic aid package and proposing that military aid be increased $400 million. Mr. Mubarak, while taking a conciliatory stand in his speech, denied he was setting new condi-tions for a solution to the Palestinian dispute. He had opened his four-day visit on Wednesday by urging President Reagan to sup-port a "national entity" for the 1.3 million Palestinian Arabs living under Israeli control.

Schmidt Policy Easily Survives Bundestag Test

BONN — Chancellor Helmut
Schmidt, seeking to rally his leftliberal coalition behind government policies, comfortably won a vote of confidence in the Bundestag Friday.

The confidence motion, only the econd of its kind in the history of the Bonn parliament, won unani-mous backing from the 269 coali-tion depunes in the lower house. All 226 conservative opposition members voted against it, leaving a government majority of 43.

The result, virtually a foregone conclusion after the Social Demoeratic and Free Democratic parliamentary parties had pledged sup-port, was announced by Bundestag Speaker Richard Stucklen after a debate lasting two and half hours.

Mr. Schmidt, who spoke first, said be had asked for a vote of confidence because a clear signal was needed of government resolve to pursue its economic and foreign policies. Publicly aired coalition differences over economic strategy, and speculation over Bonn's Ostpolitik stance toward Moscow and its allies, had at times led to a lack of "necessary clarity" in recent months, he said.

The chancellor was given a standing ovation by his party col-leagues after the vote and was presented with a bunch of roses. Free Democratic leader and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher crossed the floor of the house to called in 1972 by Chancellor Willy force early elections.

Mr. Schmidt told the house that West German voters needed to be sure that the ruling alliance, re-elected in October, 1980, would complete its full four-year term.

"Also, our allies in the West must be clear about where they stand with the Federal Republic of Germany," he said. The same applied to Eastern Europe and the Third World, he added. The chancellor had made clear before the debate that he wanted to end bickering within the coali-non that had marked weeks of dis-cussion on a job creation program

But the 12.5-billion Deutsche mark ($5.3-billion) plan, which aims to curb unemployment by promoting investment, has still to be put to parliament, and Friday's vote was not formally linked to it.

Christian Democratic Union leader Helmut Kohl, who said the vote signified a collapse of Mr. Schmidt's authority, told deputies the opposition would use its majority in the Bundesrat (upper house) to block a tax increase designed to finance the plan. signed to finance the plan.

"You have not just disappointed the confidence of most West Ger-mans, you have lost it," he said. Recalling that Mr. Schmidt's first government statement on reelection 16 months ago was entitled "Courage for the Future," the opposition leader said: "Your courage did not last long, did it?"

Chancellor Helmut Schmidt explained to the Bundestag Friday his decision to call a vote of confidence on government policies.

spread dissent within the Social Democratic Party about the chancies. He said that nothing could have damaged economic confidence more than what be called the stream of contradictory statements and proposals that had emerged from the government coali-tion in recent weeks.

"It must be made clear that you bear the responsibility for this disaster of two million jobless Your period in office has been the era of debt and unemployment,"
Mr. Kohl said.

He said that Mr. Schmidt had been accused by the Christian Democrats of steering West Germany onto a "neutralist" course and that he apparently had this in to encourage misinterpretations of Bonn policy.

The chancellor said there had been misunderstandings abroad in particular about West Germany's cautious response to martial law in Poland, which some foreign critics branded as appeasement of the Soviet Union.

"In the meantime," he said, "it has been universally understood that we Germans are second to no one in the world in our solidarity with the Polish people."

Mr. Schmidt, who has constantly pleaded for East-West dialogue, said negotiations were the only way of averting an arms race. He welcomed President Reagan's move, announced Thursday, in proposing to the Soviet Union a draft treaty on medium-range nu-

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. — The United Nations General Assembly called Friday on UN members to stop all dealings with Israel to isolate it in punishment for its annexation of the Golan Heights.

GRENOBLE, France - Despite opposition and hesitations, France's Socialist government is going aneac with the most farreaching reform program since Napoleon: the plan to put more authority iz: the hands of elected local officials. This decentralization plan, billed by Socialist ministers as "the great undertaking of [François] Mitterrand's presidency," is to gradually regionalize much of the decision making on spending and planning for everything from arban zoning to industrial development. Only education and law enforcement will remain completely in the hands of govern-

Pessimists fear that the changes will impede progress and worsen regional inequalities, perhaps even undermining national unity in troubled regions such as Corsica.

Questions Remain

The reversal of centuries-old habits leaves many questions unanswered: Which political party will gain from the change? How will the tax burden shift? Will the new system be more or less unwieldy than the Paris-centered admin-

The reform has been energetically pushed by Gaston Defferre, the nister of interior and decentralization, the latter a post created by the new government. But the Socialists' decentralization bills have been delayed by arguments about overlapping authority, taxes and other details. The delay has fueled leftist complaints that France is Under the present system, any official decision — the design of public housing or of street lamps, rules about social services to undesprivileged citizens, economic assistance to troubled factories can be overruled by the prefets. This corps of officials, created by Napoleon, have enforced the in-

Elected assemblies, at all three levels, will assume the authority of the prefets, who are to be renamed next month "republican commissioners."

The new commissioners, while losing the prefets' powers to pre-pare budgets and veto decisions, will gain a different role: The government's local departments such as public works or telecom-munications -- will have to report to the commissioner, not to their ministries in Paris.

"The commissioner and local officials, one hopes, will have to stop being rivals and start working together for the community," plained an aide to Grenoble's

But major uncertainties remain, including finance. The central govnation's tax revenue - compared to about 75 percent in most other West European countries. Many French conservatives con-

The change will be slow. "If we can shift a single additional per-cent of the tex revenue per year to local decision-making, it will be a success," Mr. Richard said. At this rate, an additional $2 billion will be funneled through local government next year.

Another financial fear is that funds will be spread so thinly that major projects will be neglected.

Another strong objection to the reform, voiced by Pierre Villard, a Grenoble real estate developer and conservative local politician, is the contention that civic management will deteriorate because local politicians lack experience.

Optimists say that local government will have to attract a new breed of caudidate — a process requiring several elections — if the reform is to work.

Vanishing Grainlands Raise Chinese Fears Over Food Production

By Christopher S. Wren New York Times Service PEKING -- The Chinese government has shown anxiety that the continuing loss of vital grainproducing acreage to cash crops and urban spread could impair China's ability to feed its population of nearly one billion.

A front-page editorial Thursday in the official People's Daily said that grain must still come first, despite a commitment to agricultural diversification.

"In areas with favorable conditions for growing food crops, peas-ants should concentrate on grain production in accordance with state planning," the Chinese party newspaper said. "They must take the interests of the whole country into account

Follows Directive

The editorial follows a government directive to the country's 800 million peasants to stop shifting farmland used for grain into more lucrative crops such as cotton, sugar and oilseeds.

The directive from the policysetting State Council, published earlier this week, explained that the present, grain supply still fell short of the country's needs and that per capita output was too low.

The State Council ordered that cash crops be increased by boosting existing yields and by develop-ing uncultivated land rather than by using grain acreage. The edict made a few exceptions for the expansion of cotton- and sugar-growing areas in northern China.

Peking's renewed attention to the problem follows the announcement last month that the 1981 grain harvest was 325.7 million tons, the second highest recorded in China. The record harvest of 332 million tons was reaped in

The insistence that further diversification not be at the expense of grain production was viewed by an Asian diplomat here as another "correction" in China's new agricultural reforms, which since 1978 have encouraged peasants to work harder by giving them more re-sponsibility and material incen-

Last year's good harvest, despite scrious floods and droughts in some prime grain areas, has been attributed mainly to the new incentives for farmers, who may now sell privately crops that exceed their state quota.

tained as a "powerful guarantee" for another bumper harvest this

But the editorial also said that peasants must be reminded of "two unchangeables" - that Chinese agriculture would remain collectivized and that land and other means of production would still be publicly owned. The loosening of restraints on farmers in the last few years has prompted some spec-ulation that the system of com-munes might be discarded. Peasants in a few areas have also taken the reforms as a license to start buying and selling land.

Planting Area Reduced

Last month, the weekly Beijing Review disclosed the extent of land loss in China when it reported that crop-growing areas had shrunk in 1981 by 6 million hec-tares, or nearly 15 million acres, Thursday, the People's Daily indicated that the attrition was even greater. The party newspaper re-ported that the planting area for food crops had been reduced last year by more than 16.5 million

This amounts to a loss of at least 6 percent of China's total crop area. Lin Huijia, the minister of agriculture, told a rally in Peking last October that China was feeding a quarter of the world's population on less than 7 percent of the world's cultivated land. Other statistics show that less than 11 percent of China's total territory is cultivated, although peasants can often extract two and sometimes three crops a year.

Agricultural land is being absorbed not only by expanding towns and villages but also by individual dwellings, as farmers who have prospered under the new re-forms upgrade their lives. A nationwide survey of supply and marketing cooperatives last year estimated that nearly a tenth of China's rural families planned to build new homes this winter.

China must keep producing more grain to feed a population that is growing by 1.7 percent a year, a rate that is attributable to the government's stringent birthcontrol policy. This still means that 48,000 babies are born every day, according to an economic sur vey by the weekly digest Wen Zai Bao. It has been estimated that the grain available on a per capita basis in China amounts to about 660 pounds (300 kilograms) annually, or less than a quarter of what Americans enjoy.

Peasants now permitted to decide what to plant have started choosing crops that are more prof-itable than cereals. Thursday, the People's Daily said that farmers should not use grain acreage be-cause they could raise the yields of existing cash crops.

The agriculture minister told the rally last October that China should be capable of feeding itself. The Chinese news agency quoted him as saying that the "moderate amount of grain imported was used basically to adjust the compo-sition of crops."

China imported about 15 million tons of grain last year and is expected to seek several million tons less this year, following the latest good harvest.

Foreign Ministry officials said Israel would bring up the Egyptian statements in contacts with Egypt and the United States. The officials said Egypt has shown it is hardening its position on autonomy, adding that "it will be very difficult to achieve results: if new obstacles are placed on the road to negotiations."

The military aid increase, State! Department sources said, would be amounced formally before day's end. Egypt is getting $900 million in military aid this year. Israel's military assistance probably will be boosted as well.

If Congress goes along, total U.S. economic and military aid to Egypt for this year will be $2.3 bil-lion. Israel is due to receive $2.2 billion, but, with its expected increase, would surpass Egypt.

Israel to Develop An Advanced Jet Fighter Aircraft

New York Times Service
JERUSALEM — The Defense Ministry has announced that Israel had decided to produce its own generation of an advanced jet fighter plane, to be named the Lavie, as a way of reducing the coun-f try's dependence on aircraft purchases from the United States. The project, which has been under serious consideration for years, ts to cost about $1 billion for research and development. A proto-type is expected by 1985, and operational aircraft are scheduled to begin coming off the assembly line

The engine is to be manufactured with the cooperation of Prati & Whitney, the Defense Ministry announced, at a factory in Beil Shemesh, west of Jerusalem. A contract was signed Thursday, according to an Israeli official, with Pratt & Whitney to manufacture an engine designated as the PW-1120.

Israel's purpose is to provide for itself a more sophisticated, locally built aircraft than its own Kfir, which it has been manufacturing since the early 1970s and selling abroad, mostly to Latin American countries.

U.S. Official Confirms Aid to States May Fall Mr. Stockman's congressional By Robert Pear

New York Times Service

WASHINGTON — David A. Stockman, director of the Office of Management and Budget has publicly confirmed for the first time that some states might suffer a net loss of federal money after 1987 as a result of President Reagan's

"New Federalism" proposals.

Administration officials had repeatedly said there would be "no winners or losers" in the return of more than 40 federal programs to the states. In his State of the Union message, Mr. Reagan said there would be a "financially equal swap" if, as he proposed, the federal government assumed all Medicaid costs in exchange for the states' taking over the welfare and food stamp programs.

However, under intensive quesoning by Democratic senators, the promise of "no winners or losers" applied only to the first phase of the New Federalism initiative, ending in 1987.

Sen. Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, asked Mr. Stockman, "Are you able to give us assurance that there will be no winners or losers after 1987?" The budget director replied: "No, because you can't make the world stand still. Whn knows what's going to happen between now and 1987 or 1995 to state tax bases and so forth?"

Governors and members of Congress have responded cautiously to Mr. Reagan's proposals because they feared that their states might lose money in any sweeping realignment of federal and state re-sponsibilities for social welfare and other domestic programs.

"You can't say everything in one breath," Mr. Stockman said in ex-plaining to the Senate Committee Governmental Affairs wby the administration had not empha-sized the limits of its pledge to protect states from financial loss, testimony was his first since publication of The Atlantic Monthly article in which he was quoted as expressing doubts about Mr. Reagan's economie recovery program. Mr. Stockman vehemently denied Thursday that be had "misled" or "deceived" Congress in budget deliberations last year.

He deflected most criticism of the president's New Federalism proposals but was taunted by Democrats, who said they no longer trusted his budget figures. Sen. John H. Glenn Jr., Democrat of Ohio, told Mr. Stockman:

he trusted you last year and we were deceived, deliberately deceived. Mr. Stockman said that "there is no central budget computer at OMB that I could rig or tinker with or alter in any way." More-over, he declared, "The notion that anybody has been misled, anybody

"We trusted you last year, the pub-has been deceived, anything has been rigged is absolutely and atterly without foundation." The reaction to Mr. Stockman was divided along partisan lines, with Republicans hailing the New Federalism proposal as an innovative effort to return power to the local level. Democrats said it would pit rich states against poor states and divert public attention from serious economic problems.

Mr. Stockman said the plan was in nn sense designed to divert at-tention from the economy. "This," he said, "is a good solution to a different problem," the excessive concentration of decision-making anthority at the federal level.

But Sen. Henry M. Jackson, Democrat of Washington, told Mr. Stockman that the Reagan administration could not sell New Federalism to people who were unem-ployed, impoverished and hungry, "When you go out and start talking to people about New Federal-ism," Sen. Jackson said, "they say, 'How do you eat it?' "

F ...

David A. Stockman

Mr. Stockman said he knew that there were great disparities in the cash welfare benefits offered in various states. But he said the food stamp program had "washed out the traditional disparities" because poor families receiving low welfare payments were eligible for large alotments of food stamps.

Sen. John C. Danforth, Republi-can of Missouri, suggested that there should perhaps be a permanent requirement for states to maintain welfare and food stamp benefits at nn less than current lev els. Mr. Stockman hrushed aside the suggestion. If Congress ap-proved the return of federal programs to the states, he said, "you would not necessarily want it marred by continued federal intrusion in one area."

The main purpose of the president's proposals is not to eliminate fiscal disparities among the states, he said, but rather to realign federal and state responsibilities. He warned that if Congress tried to equalize the fiscal capacity of the states, it would be entering an

Poll Finds Concern Over U.S. Jobless

WASHINGTON — By a ratio of 2 to 1. Americans say they feel that President Reagan's recovery pro-gram has burt rather than helped the nation's economy so far, ac-cording to a Washington Post-ABC News poll.

But a substantial majority also says Mr. Reagan's tax and spending cuts will have a favorable effect on the economy a year from

Half those interviewed said that economic conditions are getting worse, and only one in six says they are getting better.

Half continued to see inflation and the high cost of living as the nation's leading problem. But a fifth said unemployment is the main difficulty.

Increased Concern Over Jobs Concern over unemployment is higher than it has been in more than four years, and is accompanied by a widespread expressed helief that the president has shunted aside the poor and working class and cares more about serving the wealthy than all people equally.

Three of four people said they

there was widespread disapproval of his bandling of unemployment, and more than four in 10 said he is "going too far in his plan to cut back or eliminate government social programs." Again, those figures showed virtually no change

 Mr. Reagan has broad sup-port, at least in theory, for his proposals to turn many national programs over to the states. Seventyfour percent of those interviewed said they approve of states "taking over some social programs now run by the federal government." The poll, however, was conducted before it became clear that Reagan wants Congress to reduce funding for many programs before the states take control of them.

 By 78 to 18 percent, the publie opposed giving federal tax ben-efits to private schools that refuse to admit blacks. Mr. Reagan has shelved an Internal Revenue Service regulation denying those schools such benefits. One white in they believe that Mr. Reagan is not sympathetic to the problems of black people in this country. Further Cuts to Be Sought

The poll came as Mr. Reagan was about to seek further spending cuts in Congress.

The president's apponents doubtless will cite the failure of his program to show results, and will imer at him for what they view as his fuvoritism for big husiness over the working man and the rich over the poor.

But proponents of Mr. Reagan's program also will be able to look to public opinion in making their case. For example, four of five respondents to the poll approved of his decision not to raise taxes, despite recent Congressional pres-sure on the White House to do so.

tions entirely.
"We think it's an outrage," said a spokesman for American Citizens Abroad, a Geneva-based organization that seeks more favorable treatment for Americans living overseas. But, the spokesman said, it is probably too late to seek any changes in the way the deductions are calculated because a new system for taxing overseas Ameri-cans takes effect for income earned in 1982 and after. Erle T. Curtis, a State Department official who makes up the by-ing-cost tables for the Internal Revenue Service, said the sharp drops in cost-of-living deductions for Americans in Europe were largely due to the dollar's rise Because the Internal Revenue Service uses July currency rates to determine the cost of living for the full year, the changes in deductions were particularly large. Last July, the dollar was at or approaching 20-year highs against major currencies. In July, 1980, the

the average of dollar exchange rates for the entire year. The IRS determines the deductions for each country by comparing the cost of living there in dollars for U.S. citizens to the cost of against European currencies last living in the United States. When the dollar buys more, the deductions fall even if the amount of Deutsche marks, francs or yen required to live abroad does not.

In West Germany, for exampl the IRS figured that costs in 1980 for a typical American family were about 60 percent higher than they that the West German costs were only 16 percent higher than those in the United States. The cost difference thus narrowed by about 73 percent, lowering the cost-of-living deductions by a similar amount. To figure what a typical American family's costs are, the IRS uses the pay of an employee at Grade 14, Step 1, of the U.S. government scale. That level was $37,971 last ear. After certain deductions, the IRS calculates, a family of four at such an income level had "spend-able income" in the United States The family's expenses were about 16 percent higher in West Germany than they would have been in the United States, the IRS figures, so it allows the family to deduct from its 1981 taxable income about 16 percent of its spendable income. The deduction works out to $2,600, down 73 percent from the $9,400 deduction the family was allowed a year earlier.

The dollar rose about 38 percent against the Deutsche mark between July, 1980, and July, 1981. But the IRS calculations also take intn account other factors, such as the two countries and the rise in the U.S. government pay scale.

The cost-of-living deductions were created by the Foreign Earned Income Act of 1978, which also provides deductions for the costs of bousing, education and annual home leaves, Overseas Americans lobbied hard for change, insisting that they were being treated less kindly than other nations' expatriates. Last year, Congress approved new tax rules for 1982 and after, allowing Americans who live abroad for at least one year to exclude the first $75,000 of their income and deduct housing costs above a certain The amount excluded from income tax is to rise in steps to $95,000 in

When the cost-of-living tables came out in November, American Citizens Abroad sent protests to congressmen, but it got little response, the spokesman for the group said. He said congressmen apparently felt they had done enough for overseas Americans with the tax-law changes approved fnr 1982.

Mathematicians Find Key to a Prime Problem

By Walter Sullivan

New York Times Service NEW YORK — Two Europeans have devised a rapid solution to a problem that has tautalized mathematicians for centuries: How to determine whether a large number is a prime number, indivisible by any other number except I and itself.

According to American mathematicians whose earlier work set the stage for the achievement, the method can determine within seconds whether a number formed of as many as 100 digits is a prime number. The procedure bas evolved over the last two years as computer programs to perform the task

The procedure has most recently been tested on a 97-digit number. The number had figured in research on number theory by John Brillhart at the University of Arizona in Tucson. American mathematicians were almost sure that it was a prime number and sent it to two European mathematicians, who had been making rapid progress in the testing procedure.

The two, Hendrik Lenstra at the Mathematical Institute of the University of Amsterdam in the Netherlands and Henri Cohen of the University of Bordeaux, were able to demonstrate unequivocally in only 77 seconds that the number was prime. With conventional mathematics it might have taken a century or more. With the aid of computers, however, this had been reduced to ist, the achievement has raised questions about the so-called public key coding systems, now considered undecipherable. They depend on the apparent impossibility of determining, in any reasonable time, whether a very large number is a multiple of two prime

Thursday, Carl Pomerance of the University of Georgia in Athens, who helped devel-op the original computer strategy for prime number testing noted that until recently, quick testing for prime numbers had itself seemed out of reach. Perhaps, he suggested, a similar breakthrough is possible with regard to public key cipher systems.

However, all participants in the research interviewed Thursday agreed that identifying prime numbers did not bear directly on breaking such codes. Leonard Adleman of the University of Southern California said that he also doubted that the achievem increased the likelihood that a method would be found to decipher the coding systems, in whose development he played a role.

One of his colleagues in that earlier effort, Ronald L. Rivest of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said that the new meth-od of identifying large prime numbers would, in fact, help in preparing the codes.

Testing whether small numbers are prime can be performed by successively attempting to divide them by numbers running upward from 1. For larger numbers this becomes hopelessly time-consuming, even with the most powerful computers.

Robert Rumely of the University of Georgia, who, with Mr. Adleman and Mr. Pomerance, devised the original computer procedure, pointed out that this method would require a time comparable to the age of the universe to analyze a number of 100

A trick devised by theorists some time ago, he said, is using so-called pseudo prime tests. Most composite numbers — those that are not prime - will fail such tests. If a number s many of them, the probability is very great that it is a prime number. This can be confirmed by attempting to divide the num-ber by a catalogue of residual numbers.

The challenge was to limit the number of necessary tests to a few thousand, leaving a residue of only a few divisors to be used for final testing. If, after passing all the pseudo prime tests, the large number was not divisiprime tests, the large number was be prime.

An algorithm, or mathematical strategy, directed toward such a procedure was dev oped by Mr. Adleman, Mr. Pomerance and Mr. Rumely two years ago but, as Mr. Rumely pointed out Thursday, it was still "nc. very practical."

When William Dubuque, an MIT under-graduate, applied the method to a 60-digit number, the analysis took six hours. Mean-while, in Europe, Mr. Cohen was exchanging ideas with Mr. Lenstra, who had access to a large computer and whose brother, A.K. Lenstra, "debugged" the program, according to the Americans. Mr. Rumely that said both theoretical and practical innovations by the two finally cut the time to seconds.

BOSTON — President John F. Kennedy's decision to tape White in 1973. House conversations was influenced, two close Kennedy aides have theorized, by the behavior of staff members who denied their roles in planning the failed Bay of Pies invasion.

Pierre Salinger, Kennedy's press secretary, suggested that the system was begun after the unsuccessful invasion of Cuba in 1961 because Kennedy was quite out-raged at this effort of people disassociating themselves from something that they had been cenurally involved in.

"And I think that may have been a motivation for the starting of tapes ... so that he could have an accurate record when he sat down and wrote his view," Mr. Salinger said. The former press secretary, now a correspondent for will know exactly." ABC News, said he was unaware

History and Context

Pity poor Clio, the mussed-up muse of history. It sometimes seems as if the old girl is invoked almost as often as national security is to justify a president's doing something he shouldn't have done. So here we are with the Kennedy tapes, fruit of a system installed in JFK's White House, which permitted the late president to record those conversations in his office that he wished to, without the other participants' knowing that their words were being taped. There was a lot wrong with this when Richard Nixon did it, and it doesn't get any prettier with a change of presidents or a change of party.

We begin by noting that, while it is true that such taped conversations make an obvious contribution to the historical record, they can be misleading, too, implying a definitive and exhaustive truth that they don't really convey. Verbatim reports, after all, do not include context, do not necessarily tell you what was said before and what was said after, what the mood was, what was the degree of irony and who might have been setting up or testing or playing games with whom.

In the unique Nixon case, it is true that the tapes, discovered after two starkly conflicting versions of events (Mr. Nixon's and John Dean's) had been put forth, had the virtue of providing a way to judge who had been telling (more nearly) the truth about what was said. And what was being said was relevant to charges in various criminal proceedings. But even so, the built-in shortcomings of such context-free tapes were the stuff of much argument - in and out of court over the meaning of what was recorded.

And it should be noted that the Kennedy tapes, as witnesses to history, would be in a sense even less reliable, not more. That is because Mr. Nixon's undiscriminating system was "voice-activated" and recorded everything, damaging or not. But President Kennedy was at the controls of his, deciding as he went along what part of what conversations to record and what to leave out.

Even with these drawbacks, we expect, the historical justification for ambitious, grandscale recording could be made - but, surely, it could only be honorably made if the other participants had been warned of what was going on. Here is what we said of Richard Nixon's enterprise in 1973, and we wouldn't change a word of it in relation to John F. Kennedy or Franklin D. Roosevelt, who apparently also engaged in some form of the practice:

"There is, it seems to us, something basically indecent about the president of the United States invading the innocent privacy of the great and the ordinary as they conduct their business at the highest level of the American government. We agree with Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), who said that a person chatting privately with the president is entitled to be told' that his remarks are being taped.... History is an utterly inadequate justification for the indecency of taping conversations without a forewarning."

One of the arguments all administrations make for the maintenance of privacy in their various deliberations is that individuals will not feel free to speak their minds and to offer controversial or accident-prone advice if they are fearful that what they have said will be made public to their subsequent chagrin. This unexceptionable principle certainly was invoked in the Kennedy years to press the claim of secrecy — do you remember how much tut-tutting there was on this count when Adlai Stevenson's dovish counsel in the Cuban missile crisis was revealed? Well, it does seem to us, as a further argument against this kind of taping operation, that advisers will feel no more confident or secure in offering advice ir a "leak-free" environment so long as it is possible that someone is taping their comments for subsequent disclosure in a form over which they will have no con-

Mubarak's Own Act

Anwar Sadat was bound to be a tough act to follow as president of Egypt, but Hosni Mubarak, who has been in Washington this week, is establishing himself as his own man. It is beside the point to ask whether he could have made his predecessor's breakthrough to Israel. The test for Mr. Mubarak is whether he can adjust Egypt's policy to his own more modest personal style and, in particular, to the imminent recovery of the final territory Egypt lost to Israel in the 1967 war.

politician is known by his enem Mr. Sadat made many. This was not all bad, since a good number of his enemies, inside and outside Egypt, were made enemies by his Israel initiative. Isolation, however, was not a condition that Mr. Mubarak needed or wanted to sustain, and he has moved to accommodate many of the domestic elements — the violence-prone Moslem extremists excluded - and foreign governments that were alicnated during the Sadat period. He is taking Egypt back into a more traditional role in respect both to radical and conservative Arab regimes. With a timing obviously meant to strengthen his bargaining position in Washington, he threw out a line to Moscow, in the name of "nonalignment."

In short, Mr. Mubarak is holding to the new Sadat line of friendship with the United States and peace with Israel, but he is also trying to restore some of the old Nasser line of broader ties in the Arab and Communist worlds. This effort comes to a focus on the issue of Egypt's approach to the Palestinian autonomy talks now that recovery of the rest of the Sinai is only a few months away.

Mr. Mubarak's evident standard for an autonomy agreement with Israel is that the agreement draw in mainline Palestinians. This alone, he evidently feels, will allow him to restore Egypt's standing with its fellow Arab states. By contrast, the Israeli government wants an agreement that excludes mainline Palestinians, whose political claims

Mr. Mubarak is the one on the right track. Some of the words he is using in respect to the Palestinians, such as "self-determination" and "national entity," are not in the Camp David texts. But the gist of what he is demanding - Palestinian participation in a process whose outcome will be settled by mutual Arab-Israeli consent - is exactly what Menachem Begin committed Israel to at Camp David. Jimmy Carter made the same commitment for the United States. Unfortunately, Ronald Reagan has yet to make clear that he accepts it.

Regulated Reporting

The dubious proposals advanced in the UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to license journalists have so far survived the denunciation of Western editors. But now they face a more formidable threat: embrace, by imitation, from South Africa.

An official South African commission has proposed a law to make it illegal to hire an unlicensed journalist or publish reports from any such journalist. The commission contends that its proposals — which the govern-ment indicates it is eager to enact — are a response to the "onslaught" of hostile propaganda about South Africa from all sides, including "the English-speaking white Western democratic' world."

Yet, with characteristic South African bluntness, the commission invokes its real concern. Citing the country's "First- and Third-World population mix," it worries that unregulated reporting could have "a much greater impact upon the often unsophisticated, half-illiterate mind."

In other words, regulated reporting would have just the right kind of impact.

Until now, South Africa's friends have pointed to a relatively free press as one of the few signs that Pretoria is the capital of a democratic society. This proposal would go a long way toward making the press yet another instrument of entrenched white political power. The only thing democrats can register about such proposals is disgust.

South African Press Freedom

Visitors to South Africa are often surprised by the apparent freedom of the press. This freedom has been steadily diminished, but enough remains to be of value. If the recommendations just published by a committee under Mr. Justice Marthinus Steyn are made law, even that will be put in doubt. A closer confinement of the press must have a damaging effect on South African life. Even the most optimistic predictions for the country foresee difficult but unavoidable adjustments for white South Africans. For that they will need as much information as possible. How will they get it without a free press?

Haig a Hostage to Fortune on Poland Policy

By George F. Will

WASHINGTON — Everyone needs a hobby, and Teddy Gleason's hobby is stiff-ening U.S. foreign policy. He is head of the International Longshoremen's Association, and if the Reagan administration will not seriously restrict trade with the Russian and Pol-ish regimes that are brutalizing Poland's labor movement, Gleason's men may do it. Gleason's foreign policy would be a distinct improvement on the government's. The gov-ernment has paid $71 million to U.S. banks in lieu of interest payments Poland owes on loans that the U.S. government guaranteed. The payment was contrary to the law, which requires prior notice of default. Indeed, the purpose of this surreptitious payment was to prevent Po-land from being declared in default, which would disrupt East-West trade and efforts to

Haig has had his way with the U.S. response to Poland's crisis and has become a hostage to fortune. He says the crisis has just begun and the United States must hold all serious measures in reserve for when the going gets rough. But what additional suffering by Poland could provoke action from people who worship at the "temple" of allied unity?

In Cuba, Russia long ago repealed the Mon-roe Doctrine, and now, with the arrival of heavy bombers, advanced fighters and 63,000 tons of war material, it is shredding whatever is left of whatever agreement was reached at the end of the Cuban missile crisis. Haig is adamant, and correct, concerning the need for difficult decisions about El Salvador and the source of much other violence, Cuba. But he seems oblivious to certain problems inherent in the conduct of foreign policy in a democracy — oblivious to the practical consequences of symbolism, and to the demoralizing symbolism of U.S. policy regarding Poland.

L ONDON — The peacekeeping operation mounted by the Organization of African Unity in Chad is not going well and raises the question: Should not peacekeeping be left to the United National which has the experience. tions, which has the experience, the money and the authority, once the appropriate resolutions are passed, to do a more expert and acceptable job?

This is not to question the criti-cal role the OAU force has played so far. It has made possible the re-moval of the Libyans, and it has exerted a calming influence, at least in Ndjamena. But its position is tennous, it is below strength, it has severe logistical and communications problems and it is desperately short of cash.

The Nigerians have decided to take the Chad peacekeeping ques-tion to the United Nations. It is revealing to trace the series of events that convinced them that the UN is a sounder authority than the OAU.

The Nigerians began by think-ing, in the face of OAU prevarica-tion, that they could do the job of bringing peace to Chad by them-selves. In April, 1979, a Nigerian battalion arrived with light weapons and a few armored vehicles. The force was shot at by several factions — there were 11 at that point - and the Nigerian commander did not know who the enemy was or whether the Nigerians had the authority to shoot, and in what circumstances. The battalion was withdrawn three months later.

This was followed in January, 1980, by the first attempt at sending in an OAU force, comprising Guinea, Benin and Congo. Only the Congolese got there. The recent effort, although more least of their gripes is their conviction that they are being under-mined by the OAU forces' chief outside paymaster, the United States. It is said that Washington has not come through with the amounts of cash it promised, and the widely respected former presi-dent of Nigeria, Gen. Olusegun Obasanjo, tells me that the United States, even after the OAU force went in, inexplicably supplied weaponry to the rebel forces of Mr. Hissene Habré.

Regional peacekeeping efforts are not, it seems, the simple answer to external interference that some suggest. While it is compara-tively straightforward to ask coun-tries to produce half a dozen battalions of infantry, only a very few countries possess the signals, supply units and traffic control neces sary to make the force function effectively. Moreover, when finance is sought from a great power, it is bound to raise anxieties. Finally, on the use of force, the UN Charter is quite explicit: While it encourages "regional arrangements for the settlement of disputes and the maintenance of peace and se-curity, the United Nations, through the Security Council, is the only grouping of nations that has the authority to mandate the use of weapons in peacekeeping

Can the UN become more active in peacekeeping? Or is it too bogged down by great power disputes and traditional Soviet hostility to UN intervention? While it is true that the Russians are cautious about peacekeeping they have from time to time judged it the wiser course of action, even if they are not prepared to pay for it. Critics can point to their refusal successful, has left the Nigerians, in recent years to agree to the reits backbone, feeling sore. Not the

One of the real worries about the United Nations is the back-ofthe envelope way peacekeeping is now organized. In the UN's early years it was the responsibility of Ralph Bunche. It's Not Nice, It's Nasty

by Richard Eder

NTIBES, France - For the last 15 years Graham Greene has been living in an unremarkable fourth-floor apartment overlooking this Cote d'Azur port: a quiet, clusive presence. It is not that the townspeople do not know about him — be tries to be away during the tourist rush
— but they respect the fact that even when he is not off to the Congo or Paraguay or Panama, his mind is.

At the Anberge Provençale, where Greene At the Anderge Provençale, where Greene eats after walking across town, the owner turns down requests from neighbors who want to be introduced. "He is a great writer," the owner says, "and be must be respected." He is accordingly overwhelmed and baffled by the noise surging now around Greene. "It is a shame what they are doing to him," be says.

A writer who kept his personal life so much out of the way that his antobiography, "A Sort of Life," stops in his 20s, Greene has made a public issue of a private anguish in order to campaign against what he calls organized crime and police corruption in Nice, 10 miles down the coast. In reply, the mayor of Nice, Jacques Médecin, sometimes accused of being linked with the underworld, charged Greene with "spitting in the soup." Nice-Matin, a newspaper opposed to Médecin, said that the only scandal was Greene's impudence.

Since he wrote a letter to The Times of London two weeks ago, Greene has been saying publicly that he has proof that at least two policemen, a lawyer and a judge in Nice are corrupt and that their corruption, and the activities of organized crime, is protected at high-er levels. He says he is working on a pamphlet to denounce the corruption.

Nice's reputation for corruption is all but n national verity in France; at least two gangs one Corsican, one made up of European emigres from North Africa — have fought over gamhling and other profitable activities for years. At one point part of the police force was charged with moonlighting as burglars; more recently both of the principal casinos were closed for irregularities.

Greene's charges, therefore, were not in themselves particularly startling. The startling thing was that, when a bit of the local unsavoriness touched a corner of his own life, he decided to test what a world reputation could do against a series of tightknit local arrangements in a city that has enjoyed its own brand of Mediterranean nurmoil for about 2,000 years.

In 1960, when Greene was in the Congo, he became friendly with a French-Swiss couple who had two children, both girls. In 1966, when he moved to Antibes, he discovered the family had moved to Juan-les-Pins, just down the coast. The friendship continued, becoming almost that of a family. The oldest daughter, Martine, married a man from Nice named Daniel. The marriage broke up in 1979 after a number of incidents. After a divorce giving Martine custody of their daughters — though she was obliged to give the father visiting rights and live no more than a quarter mile away from him — Daniel went to the house of Martine's parents, where the older daughter was visiting, assaulted Mar-tine's father and took the child.

The police took no action against Daniel: when Greene began investigating he found that Daniel had a long criminal record and was on close terms with a number of police officers and at least one judge. Although Dan-iel owned a modest real estate business, he drove expensive cars and lived flashily. A French newspaper reported he had been close-ly involved with one of Nice's major gambling

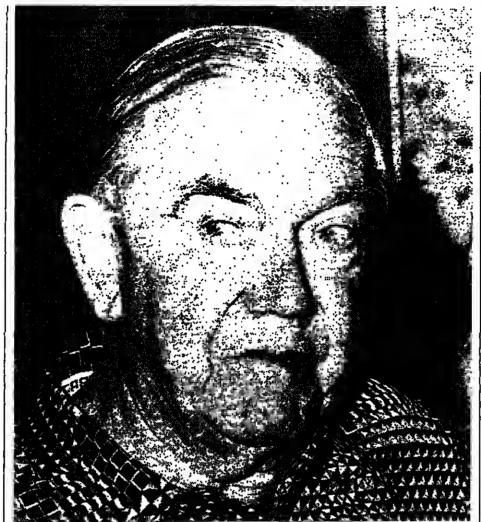

"I found that Martine's lawyer was regularly visiting Daniel all during the divorce proceedings," Greene says in an interview here. "Another policeman was accepting a special price on an apartment from him."

Martine, fearing her second daughter would be taken, left France with her. Greene, con-vinced she was the victim of a system of corruption that protected her former busband, began his campaign. His first step was to try to give back his Legion of Honor to the government. "They returned it to me," he notes, "say-ing that only my death or disgrace could forfeit it, and that having it might be useful to

In 1980 Greene appealed to Alain Peyre-fitte, a writer who was also minister of justice under President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, "He moved like lightning," Greene recalls. "In a few days a special inspector general was sent to Nice. He had expected to spend 24 hours with the police here; instead he spent four days and he told me later that the situation

A local judge was transferred as a result, hut the investigation flagged during the election campaign. Greene waited for it to be taken up again after the Socialists under François Mit-terrand came to power. "I have as much confi-dence in the Socialists as in the former government," he says. "Maybe a little more."

"It is not a political thing," he continues.
"But I thought I would give it a little push. I remember one man from the Interior Ministry told me: Nice has a wall. It consists of the milieu of disbonest police, dishonest jndges; not all but some. He told me they were having great difficulty in piercing the wall, that one day they will find a hole in it and it will all come falling down."

Greene's letter to The Times of London, he says, was designed to make the hole. Some angry counterattacks have fallen down to An-tibes, at least. In one oewspaper, Daniel said that Martine's mother had been Greene's mistress. The writer says that this was long ago, and that his relationship with the family had long been one of close friendship.

Did he think this effort would make any permanent difference? "I don't know," he says. "It has been a bombshell here. The dossier has just been sent to the new minister of justice. If it helps correct the injustice to an innocent woman and her two children it will be worthwhile. I think of all the people who don't have an eminent writer to push their

"Graham is almost painfully shy and doesn't like being interviewed," his publisher, Hans Polak, pleads. And indeed, Greene does sound a bit intimidated on the air. But, at a semi-intimate press dinner, the reluctant liter-ary lion proves a voluble, outspoken and charming guest as he chars about such topics as Vienna, corruption in Nice ("The only title I can think of for what I am going to write about it is Zola's: 'J'Accuse'") and writers in prison for their politics ("I object to writers being in prison other than for crimes"). Clubby and tweedy at 77, Greene declines to give an after-dinner speech, but is open to questions from the moment he saunters in for cocktails. Inevitably, he is asked how Vienna had changed since his "Third Man" days of four-power occupation, seedy scavenging and corruption in the rubble of a bomb-devastated

Conceding that the change is immense, Greene, who has been back bere four or five times, goes on to note that "There was an enormous change just between February of 1947, when I came here looking for a story, and three or four months later, when I re-turned with Carol Reed, the director, to discuss where shooting should take place." ons ruins and all the thriving hlack-market res-taurants had vanished, "I had to say over and over again: 'But what I wrote was perfectly accurate. It was like that three months ago."

Equally accurate was the diluted penicillin racket, with its side effects of death and defor-mity, led by the unforgettable Harry Lime in "The Third Man." Many months later in London, Greene says, a surgeon took two friends to see the film. He was surprised to find them subdined and depressed by a picture he had enjoyed," Greene recalls. "They then told him that at the end of the war when they were with the Royal Air Force they had themselves sold penicillin in Vienna. The possible consequences of their act had never before occurred to pages of what is known as "Greeneland," corruption is endemic, but Greene sees it as epidemic, too: "Once one has seen a dead child in a ditch in Vietnam or Mexico in the time of a ditch in Victiam of Medica in the time of religious purges" or Haiu under Papa Doc Du-valier or Cuba under Batista, one is no longer inventing fictions called "The Quiet Ameri-can" or "The Power and the Glory" or "The Comedians" or "Our Man in Havana." No. says Greene, "This land is not my land. It's the Greene has recently finished writing "a comic novel with a slightly sad ending that will cause a little bit of a scandal in Spain." It is about a modern Don Quixote, in this case, a parisb priest wbn, "under curious circumstances and against his will, is made a monsigner and one traveling. His views are not also nor and goes traveling. His views are not alto-gether in accord with the teachings of the church." (Neither are Greene's. As one of Catholicism's more-celebrated converts, he re-marks: "I have so much admiration for the pope as a personality and a political figure and for his courage that I wish he'd left the subject

And now, be says, "I'm planning a short nonfiction book on the corruption in the city of Nice, which is almost beyond belief. There are magistrates who are not to be trusted, lawyers who can be bought, the worst criminal milieu in France and a police force that plays with the milieu. They've already taken notice of what I'm doing and strange unpleasantnesses have happened."

In another conversation, Greene elaborates on this by saying that, late last year, he got a phone call at his home in Antibes, asking whether he would receive three members of Italy's Red Brigades. When Greene said no, he was asked why oot "Because I would have to leave France the next day," he replied. "I bave the impression," Greene continues, "that Nice is a hidcont when things are bot for the Red Brigades," Since his phone number is not listed, he has his suspicions as to "how they got on to me."

At the dinner, he is asked, "With so many subjects for a writer to look into, why pick such a small and silly subject as the corruption

"Because it has affected my friends person-ally and even my own life," he replies. Is the writer taking any precautions? Tight-lipped as the anti-hero of a Graham Greene entertainment, Greene replies, "One has a tear-gas bomh."

From Out of the Blue, 2 'Lost' Old Masters

by Souren Melikian

ARIS - After years of frantic art hunting by dealers and auctioneers, not to mention art historians, it would seem almost impossible that two important works by a major artist of the 17th century should suddenly surface.

But this has just happened in Paris, where two large-size paintings by Simon Vouet (1590-1649), the key figure in the emergence of French classicism, have turned up out of the blue, each one with a different provenance. They might bave continued to remain unknown by all save their owners - whose names have not been made public, in keeping with French auction room custom — if they had not decided to sell them at auction. The works will be included in the old master sale to be conducted by Lucien Solanet on March 5.

Discoveries of this kind do happen from time to time. An unrecorded Cranach appeared at Sotheby's a decade ago; more recently an unforgettable Dirck Bouts surfaced, again at Sotheby's, in April, 1980. But discoveries rarely take place in pairs, particularly concerning a rare artist such as Vouet, whose recorded works number less than 100.

Technically speaking, the earlier of the two "new" Vouet pictures is not unknown: It was sold at the Hotel Drouot in 1892 as part of the famous Giron de Buzaringue collection and was illustrated in the sale catalog with a photo-graphic plate in mellow brown shades. However, art historians seldom look up auction re-cords. No mention is made of its existence in the only existing monograph on Vouet, written in 1962 by William Crelly, "The Painting of Simon Vouet," and no photograph of it has ever been published in any book.

Simon was the son of Laurent Vouet, a paroter attached to the French court whose work does not appear to have survived. Simon's gifts were precociously awakened in the favorable family environment. If we are to trust the account of the 18th-century coanoisseur and dealer Mariette, he was only 14 wheat he was called to England by a French nohlewoman who commissioned him to do her portrait. For a while, he seems to have made a living as a successful portraitist in Loudon; alas, we know nothing about his English peri-

In 1611, Vouet went off to Turkey with the French ambassador to the court of Islanbul. He spent a year in the Turkish capital but, strangely enough, this seems to have left no imprint whatever in his known work. He was back in Venice in late 1612 and a few months later moved to Rome, where he spent the next

The ambitious Vouct was soon established as the coming young foreigner of the Cara-vaggesque generation. By 1618, he was painting large compositions such as "The Temptation of St. Francis," still to be seen in St. Lorenzo di Lucina in Rome. His handling of faces and postures at that time has the theatrical touch of Caravaggio if not quite the same power, and his chiaroscuro puts him in the same league as the "Tenebrosi," as his Caravaggio-obssessed colleagues were labeled. He soon became the rage of the town. In 1620 he was called to Genoa to decorate the palace of the powerful Doria family.

Four years later, be was back in Rome, where his protector, Cardinal Barberini, now Pope Urban VIII, got him innumerable commissions. So thoroughly adjusted to his Italian surroundings was this brilliant northerner who had made good in the European capital of the arts that he married a young woman painter. arts that he married a young woman painter, Virginia da Vezzo, in 1626. Many of his pic-tures preserved in Rome — in the Church of St. Peter, the Capitol Museum and elsewhere — date from that year, which marks the high tide of his Italianate style. Yet it is then that n dramatic change took place in his manner that not only affected his own art but indeed the fate of French painting as a whole. Suddenly, Vonet switched to a lighter color scheme. His figures lost their agitated appearance, acquiring on the contrary a serenity unknown to the Caravaggesque move-

His first painting in the new style, dated 1626, is in the National Gallery in Rome. A year later, the French master was called to Paris by the Cardinal de Richelien, King Louis XIII's chief minister. At the request of the king, Vouet established his residence in the Louvre Palace. His activity was intense. Within a short time, he established a close rapport with the king, whom be taught the art of drawing. He worked successively in the Palais du Luxembourg for the Queen Mother, in the Chateau de Rueil for the Cardinal de Richelieu and in the Palais Royal. In fact, he worked for almost any important member of the aristocracy who had money and patronized the arts. It is about that time that Vouet must have painted "The Allegory of Fortune" that will be sold at Drouot, Lucien Solanet believes it may have formed part of a decorative group of paintings set into the paneling of a mansion. The slanting composition, with the young draped woman leaning to the right, implies a matching painting in reverse orientation. Yet, this is no trifling ornamental piece. The reflective smile of the young woman conveys a feet-ing of subdued mirth. Gone is the tempestuous mood of the earlier Caravaggesque period. In its serene happiness there is already a sugges-tion of the inner life that was to come out during Vouet's full maturity.

This is illustrated by the second painting dis-covered by Solanet. Hitherto unrecorded, it is dogs are not even remotely related to the mas-ter's earlier Italian style. Nor is the landscape, which is not just a setting, as it would be in the Caravaggesque school. The threatening atmosphere contributes to the sense of impending doom. Even the ecric look of the dogs adds to the touch of ambiguous tragedy.

By the standards of European institutions, one detail speaks against the picture. Diana's left breast, originally bare, was overpainted a short while after Vouet completed his work. The quality of the paint and the crackles leave little doubt about that. The instigator might have been the aging Madame de Maintenon later in the century when the bigoted spouse of King Louis XIV could not bear the sight of To try to remove the added layer of paint would be taking a big chance, since there is no way of ascertaining just what the original paint looks like underneath. Such an early alteration

American buyers would probably not mind the alteration. They were the first to rediscover repressed suffering and resignation, the look of premature lucidity and understanding of the young girl looking back as she holds the two dogs are not even remotely related to the mas-Charles Sterling, who stressed the importance of that school. For years, U.S. buyers had the floor all to themselves. As late as the 1970s, the finest works anctioned at Drouot often landed in the lap of U.S. foundations. Such was the case among others of the superb allegorical still life of "The Five Senses" by Linard, reportedly bought in 1972 by the New York dealer Paul Rosenberg, later sold to Norton Simon and currently on view at the Grand Palais, in the exhibition of "French 17th-Cen-tury Paintings in U.S. Collections."

There is nothing like the second Vouct at the Grand Palais. The estimate put on the picture — 800,000 to 1 million francs — is surprisingly low. It reflects the expert's cantion in view of the restoration, which in my opinion is hardly relevant. The work stands as high in Vouet's ocuvre as did the "Flight Into Egypt" in Poussin's. That painting sold in London last year for £1.65 million and it would not be at all surprising if the Vouet went the same way via

Simon Vouet's "Diana Departing for the Hunt."

It happens that homosexuals have been identified by Fox research as a "primary constituency" for n coming Fox movie called "Making Love" — a conclusion rather easily drawn, since "Making Love" is about a young doctor (Michael Ontkean), outwardly conventional, who surrenders to Intent homosexuality and leaves the closet and his wife. The peddling of a gay statement-soap operaserious film is complicated work.

The process began last spring, when the film went into production. "The first thing you do in marketing n film, any film," says Irv Ivers, head of Fox promotion, publicity and advertising, "is to define a constituency for the movie. Who are the people who'd be most interested in seeing it? "I'll suggest to you that we spent more on [audience] research for this film—about $130,000—than we've spent on any preciert in a long time." project in a long time."

Fox researchers fanned out into several test markets armed with summaries of the movie's theme, which they presented, with a list of questions, to potential viewers. "We found that gays were extremely interested in the theme of the movie," says Doug Stern, head of Fox research. "Extremely interested. We had scores from the gays that were among the high-

That information made promoting the film to the gay market a relatively simple matter. For one thing, it meant that "mispositioning" — a marketing term meaning, roughly, decep-tion — wasn't necessary in pushiog the film to

It was decided that word-of-mouth was the most effective method of promoting the film in the gay market, so scores of screenings have been held for gays in each of the 65 markets in which "Making Love" will open. To inspire talk in the homosexual community, "gay opin-ion makers," as co-producer Allen Adler puts it, were given special screenings. One such showing was recently held in New York for

1.000 gay bartenders.

And, a special gay "look" was devised for the marketing effort. Richard Avedon, the fashion photographer, was hired to photograph the film's three stars. What Avedon delivered was directly to the point — Hamlin is pictured shirtless, in a come-hither attitude: Ontkean embraces him, with his cheek nestled against Hamlin's hair; Kate Jackson seems de-

Avedon's photograph was used as an ad-vertisement in 80 gay-oriented newspapers across the country. No explanatory message was used in the ad, just the picture and the title, "Making Love." The picture was also used as n poster that was mailed to more than 500 gay bars across the country.

used as n poster that was mailed to more than 500 gay bars across the country.

It is safe to say that a great many homosexuals will be aware of "Making Love" by the time it opens. The problem is, Fox and the producers don't quite know what that means. "I don't know how big the gay market is," says Stern, the Fox research man. "Is it 3 million? Or is it 8 million? If it's 8 million, that's terrifications are the headth have all homes." ic, because we think we'll have them all. I suspect that it's closer to 8 million than it is to 2

As Adler explains, "It becomes his and her story. The TV advertising is aimed at motivating women."

There is a simple reason for that. "Quite frankly," says co-producer Dan Mel-nick, "our research confirmed what we sus-pected early on and that is that men in my generation, 35 and older, have real trouble with the picture. With the way we've been brought up, it's just too tough for most men."

It is hoped, of course, that women won't go to see "Making Love" alone, that some of them, at least, will drag reluctant husbands and boyfriends along. Part of the plan to bring straight audiences into the theater is to assault them with a vast name-identification campaign. And one way of doing that was to put the black-background, red-lettered "Making Love" logo on the cover of matchbooks — 25 million matchbooks. Fox contracted with a

Today's Rewards for Tomorrow's Dancers

by David Stevens

Contestants for the Prix de Lausanne wait to perform.

AUSANNE, Switzerland - The Prix de Lansanne has just been held for the 10th time and is feeling pretty good about it. Since the dance competition was first held in 1973, it has become one of the most respected in the dance world, yet it is hardly a competition in the usual sense. The II jurors — all dancers or former dancers who oow teach or direct companies — are less looking for accomplishment than they are trained to explain the problem of the companies of the comp complishment than they are trying to envision possibilities. The competition's organizers mean to offer encouragement and development, not fame and fortune — that comes later, maybe.

The competition is open to all comers between the ages of 15 and 18 (19 for the boys) as long as they have had no professional dance activity, and the main prizes — called Prix de Lansanne — are one-year scholar-ships to any one of several leading dance schools along with a stipend for living expenses (7,500 Swiss francs, about $4,000, this year).

It is possible to miss out on a Prix de Lausanne scholarship by not dancing well enough, of course, but it is also possible by dancing too well, which happens when the jury awards either the Medaille d'Or (with 4,000 Swiss francs) or a Prix Professionnel (2,000 francs) in judging a competitor ready to undertake a professional career without further Philippe Braunschweig, the Swiss industrialist whose brainchild this competition is and who, with his wife, Elvire, a former ballerina, presides over the competition with a combination of businesslike efficiency and avuncular concern, cites the case of Stephane Prince. Prince, a Swiss youth who at 15 won a scholarship here in 1976, ended up at the Paris Qpera, which recently promoted him to the rank of premier danseur. Braunschweig seems almost pleased that it took him so long.

"The point is that in Lausanne in 1976 Prince was really not all that good," he says, "but the jury saw a potential that has taken this long to develop." That, he suggests, was why the dancers who please the public during the finals at the Théâtre de Beaulieu are not necessarily the ones who show what the jury is looking for.

The scene backstage after this year's award ceremony was a mixture of smiles and exuberance, tears and consolation, mingled with the chaoticarranging of which prize-winner would go to what school, o go to San Fran

San Francisco School of Ballet and one of the jurors. "Will you take The answer is yes, so if no minds are changed that is where tiny, 15 pushing through the crowd toward Richard Cammack, director of the year-old Sandrine Marache will spend the next year. The French girl, who studied with Claire Motte after being refused by the Paris Opera school, impressed the jury with Swanilda's first-act variation from "Coppelia" and a variation by Robert Bestonzo from Aaron Copland's "Ro-deo." Her porcelain-doll delicacy was far too fragile for the outdoorsy

Rodeo," but it's a fair bet that this stylistic gap will be nar-

The other scholarship winners were Delphine Collerie, 16, of France, who chose to go to the Royal Ballet School in London; Mamzio Giannetti, an exuberant 17-year-old Italian, who will probably lose some of his rough edges at the Paris Opéra school, and Shoichiro Sadamatsu, 18, of Japan, who followed his "Corsaire" variation with an exotic bit of bravura of his own invention, then opted for the Balanchinian discipline of the School of American Ballet in New York.

The other schools the winners could have chosen this year were the Academie de Danse Classique Princesse Grace in Monte Carlo, the Hamburg State Opera school, and Rosella Hightower's Centre de Danse International in Cannes.

A category was introduced this year for which Braunschweig has not yet found a name he considers suitable. It is aimed at pupils of state or subsidized schools, and in particular for those who cannot or do oot want to leave their schools.

The top award in this category (4,000 francs) went to Bonnie Moore, a 16-year-old Arizona girl who is a pupil at the Washington School of Ballet and an apprentice with the associated Washington Ballet. She was banet and apprentice with the associated washington banet, she was accompanied here by Mary Day, founder-director of the Washington company, who was quietly enjoying a winning streak. Seven months ago two of her dancers, Amanda McKerrow and Simon Dow, became the first Americans to win top prizes at the high-powered Moscow competi-

The two other prizes in this category went to two pupils of the school of the Hungarian State Opera, Tibor Imre Kovats, 18, and Katalin Volf, 17. They were the strongest proof that national styles oot only exist but 17. They were the strongest proof that national styles oot only exist but 17. are formed early. Kovats, especially, stunned onlookers with his Bolshoistyle flash and bravura leaps and turns — not to mention doing all his moves in the "Corsaire" variation in the opposite direction from the other competitors. The jury, reportedly, was split between thinking he was a diamond in the rough or an unpolished thinestone.

The audience favorite — the ban on applause was not always observed — was Kiyoko Kimura, a 17-year-old Korean girl, a product of Marika va's Monte Carlo school, who radiated a charm and assurance that filled the auditorium. She won a Prix Professionnel, as did Thierry Guiderdoni, 17, of France, a long-limbed youth of promising musicality. In all, 12 of the 15 finalists won some kind of prize, although the

the original 64 entrants. Still, many of the contestants seemed to feel that just being in the total dance atmosphere here was almost as good as winning a prize. Besides, if a prize guarantees nothing in the real world, neither does the absence of one. Shonach Mirk, a jury member this year and a principal dancer with Maurice Béjart's Ballet of the 20th Century, was a nonwinner in the first Prix de Lausanne. And in an ambiguous testimonial Catherine Zerara, who won nothing in 1978 and is now a principal dancer of the Basel Ballet, says: "I was disappointed, obviously. For the moment. Because afterward that allowed me to make my own judgment. And I was not discouraged."

Haute Cuisine With a Difference

by Jane Friedman

ERUSALEM — Jean-Pierre Haeberlin of France's three-star Auberge de l'Ill of France's three-star Alberge de l'ili says "He has the stuff of a great ehef."
Michel Lorain of the two-star Côte StJacques in Joigny. 70 miles southeast of Paris, says "He has a great future." The subject is not a young French cook, but an Israeli named Shalom Kadosh from Afula, a Galilee development town. His restaurant, The Cow on the Roof, is in the basement of Jerusalem's Plaza Hotel, and the fare he serves is kosher.

The 34-year-old Kadosh wears his white toque proudly. Despite his limited training -aboard an Israeli freighter and during short internships with some of France's great chefs
- Kadosh has developed a highly regarded haute cuisine française. Now, after copying the French masters, he is trying to fuse Middle Eastern tastes and French cuisine into a new style whose results include lamb chops wrapped in eggplant and kubeh (cracked wheat) dough, and breast of veal with mousse

Although his haute cuisine is limited by kashrut — the Jewish dietary laws, which ban pork and shellfish and forbid the use of dairy products with meat — he has avoided the com-mon solution of using margarine and pareve — substances oeither milk nor meat in their derivation — in sauces, preferring to search for natural substitutes to enhance taste. For sweetbreads, for example, Kadosh uses just a bit of margarine and a glazed honey sauce spiced with green peppercorns and flamed in curacao. He serves the sweetbreads garnished with a chestnut purée and a com crepe, neither of which contains milk products.

With his restaurant established, he is also playing a role in the culinary life of Israel: coaxing the Carmel winery to help build a cellar, trying to inspire a chefs association to trade recipes, pioneering in the importing of such delicacies as truffles. (The first batch, weighing four pounds, cost him $2,600. Cusloms officials were so appalled they thought the list price was a mistake and held up deliv-

Kadosh says he finds obstacles a challenge. "I want to show that even with the limits of kashrut, you can still make a high-class restaurant," be explains. "Israelis are now driving far to dine here. They are beginning to know more about food." His 2-year-old restaurant — which has 12 tables — is filled nightly although the bill can reach the equivalent of $50 a person for such specialities as foie gras chand, salade de pigeonneau et foie gras, loup de mer au gingembre and filet d'agneau au cassis.

Kadosh admits he never imagined such success. He was born in a Moroccan village to a family of poor Sephardic Jews; when he was 13, the family emigrated to Israel and was set-tled in Afula. With nine children, his father could hardly afford to finance Kadosb's fantasies of travel, so the boy joined the Zim ship-ping line, which is how he learned to cook. In 1974, he returned to Israel as a sous-chef at the Jerusalem Hilton but was soon hired away by the Plaza. Four months later, he was named executive chef and sent for training to Canada.

"I saw that the Canadians used everything from tin cans," he says. "We in Israel always think people overseas are doing better than us. I began to believe in the Israeli kitchen." In 1977, the Plaza sent Kadosh to the Haeberlins' Auberge de l'Ill in Alsace for a two-month apprenticeship. His stay gave him the inspiration for a restaurant where he could emulate French practices.

His hotel here had a special kitchen built. China was imported from West Germany, crystal from France and copper pois from England. Cooks had to be trained. Waiters were taught oot to gossip with customers or to lecture them, as they often do here. After reno-vacions were made and preparations finished, the hotel had spent more than $100,000. In May, 1979, The Cow on the Roof, with a menu imitative of the Auberge de l'Ill, opened to loits luster, Kadosh says it made kosher haute cuisine possible here because it fostered the development of lighter sauces, which restrict cream and butter. The only restrictions Kadosh says he cannot surmount involve desserts.

"For desserts you really have to use cream," he says. "So I'm doing sherbets with fruits; I've found pomegranates and kiwis io Israel."

Shopping: Regional Delicacies in Madrid

by Peggy Gonzalez-Aller

ADRID - Fifteen Spanish gourmets were grousing about how dif-ficult it was to find their favorite provincial foods in Madrid, when ooe had an idea, Victor Huerta, furrier by oriente, across the street from the royal pal-ace, that was about to become vacant. "Why oo!?" said the 15 in unison. And that's how "El Gourmet del Palacio" was born last year.

The spacious shop on two levels is a galaxy of the best, the purest and the rarest of Spanish cuisine. Huerta enlisted the help of his wife, Victoria Murillo, a music teacher, and their two children, Mootserrat and Victor, Jr., both students. Now the son combs the countryside for delicacies oo weekends and the daughter lends the shop when the parents are away from Madrid oo hunting and tasting therein and with the motto, "Ora y labor"

(Work and pray).

Another product, morteruela, is a paste made of pork and rabbit — or game in seasoo — that is usually found only in the province of Cuenca. Heated with a bit of olive oil, the paste is eaten as a dip or even as a main course. Then there is a lobster loaf that is the specialty of a restaurant oo the ontskirts of Madrid or a selection of Spanish sausages, among them, the sobresada of Majorca, a thick, dark sansage with a paprika flavor.

On the upper level of the store there is a wall of the finest of Spain's wines. One of the more unusual products is aguardiente, a strong li-quor of which there are three types: a rich dark brown, which is distilled by the mayor of Cacabelos, a town in the Bierzo regioo of the province of Léon; a clear, which is pure in flavor, and a lemon-yellow, flavored with

There are many liqueurs, including the light, coffee-flavored Resoli from Cuenca that is perfect for adding to chocolate. Another regional product is sidra, a fermented cider from the oorthern province of Asturias. Among the brandies there is the apple-flavored Peinados from Tomelloso in Léoo; only 3,000 bottles

No gourmet shop can exist without cheese, and although this is hardly Spain's strong point, two are outstanding. One is the Cabrales, again from Asturias, which is a strong crumbly blue variety wrapped io grape leaves, and the other is Idiazabal, a smoked semisoft prices from the Baselean and the other is Idiazabal, a smoked semisoft variety from the Basque country. Huerta re-commends the Idiazabal as an accompaniment to a very dry sherry such as a Manzanilla, or the driest of all, La Ina.

Another wall is given over to canned goods. such as white asparagus from Navarra, and specially packed paies, one of which is found only lo a mountaintop village in Logrono. Since Huerta buys the pates and cans them himself, they are of high quality and remarkably inexpensive. There are also many fine olive oils and vioegars, cherries bottled in uguar-diente and a small section of candies and home-baked goods.

A complete line of cookbooks, io Spanish ooly, can be found oo the main floor, together with gournet magazines.

Art's Utterly Blank Face

by Michael Gibson

ARIS - Maybe curators of contempoary art museums see too much of the artists whose work they show. They gradually get involved in the artist's own reflection and theory about what he is trying to do, until they begin to believe what he is doing. The artist, on the other hand, acquires a veneer of technical language that sucessfully fends off the more fundamental questions viewers may be tempted to ask him.

As a result of this, one loses sight of the fact that any work, even the most minimal, has a life of its own and escapes from the artist's closed world in which the painting is sometimes supposed to illustrate a theory he bolds. This independent existence of the painting is the reality of art. The talk surrounding it is merely the reality of the art world.

Take an exhibition like "Ateliers 81-82" at

ARC (Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris, 11 avenue du Président Wilson, Paris 16, to Feb. 21), the work of a dozen mostly mknown artists; a group of 20 Beaux-Arts students of sculptor Georges Jeanclos and a few practitioners of video. There would be no special reason to make this particular show the object of such comment, except that it is typical of a dreary circular road being followed by a number of official institutions, a fact that first came to my attention because of the comfortable sense of deja vu with which I left

One could argue that the quality of the works is variable, but the matter of interest is that their presentation in a group somehow blends them into a single statement, in which the more simplistic and dogmatic works thrust themselves to the fore as spokesmen of esthetic orthodoxy.

A characteristic trait is that the works are impenetrable. This is typical of the bureaucratic avant-garde and is the result of a profound theoretical narcissism. The point is not that they "cannot be understood," but that no relationship with them is possible. It is like being in the presence of somebody with an utterly Blankness in art can be a strategy, as has been known for about the last 80 years, but it is a strategy only as long as expressiveness is the norm. By blankness I mean both the absence of expression and the dreary presence of a plain, predictable logie. You will consider a face to be blank only if it has the requisite number of eyes, nose, mouth — and this mini-mal conformity can be ascertained at a glance. But once this has been ascertained, no further information comes through, no contact is es-tablished, and so a sense of boredom quickly overcomes you Each one of the artists of the "Ateliers" show appears to be pursuing a style. This in itself is quite as commendable as the desire to have eyes, nose, mouth, etc. But style, to con-tinue with the facial simile, is merely the logic commanding the relative size and position of the features. It does not communicate anything of real interest on its own. It is not, in this sense, a grand style (like, say, the baroque), which implies a certain vision of the world. It is only a restricted style like that of a politician or a trademark, which is no more

Now our artists, having established this minimal identity by adopting some basic element of color, module or medium, do not seem to want to go any further. They have produced and now present us with something that is in-stantly legible, like any good commercial symbol, except that in the present case it refers us to nothing else (such as a bank or a car rental service) and articulates nothing at all by its own means because these means are too restricted. So we are confronted with something that is instantly legible but devoid of any (in the artist's view) undesirably intelligible content. A far-flung creed holds that art is about art, and that content makes the world limited and parochial.

In any event the problem of content is an important one. These artists seem to avoid content in the way that children will avoid stepping on the cracks in the sidewalk for fear something unpleasant will happen. So "no content" is the first rule, with a clause in smaller print: irrelevant content allowed (as in Pop Art). This applies to content in the sense of representation of things like teacups and polar bears, but also, and much more significantly, to content in a more subtle sense. A blank face of a person or a painting keeps you at a distance as effectively as a barbed-wire fence. A face of normal expressiveness, a painting of sufficient complexity is a living organism—the first in the fleeting world of life, the other in the renewable world of fantasy. As such both can be said to have content.

The paintings shown at ARC (and countless nther places) are mere ritual repetitions of an utionalized creed. They are not provocative because today inside a museum nothing short of ritual cannibalism could provoke indignation. They are not even provocatively dull. They are merely dull. And they are dull because they have become official. They have reached a form that can bear almost any kind of theoretical justification the artist or critic may choose to resort to. The theoretical talk can vary as much as one likes, but the works are monotonously similar.

Still, it is not merely a matter of fashion, for then one could shrug it off and wait for the fashion to change. It is more likely a sort of prolongation not so much of an idea but of a vague feeling that Robert Musil mentions in "The Man Without Qualities": "It is probable that the dissolution of the anthropocentric attitude (an attitude that, after so long seeing man as the center of the universe, has been dissolving for some centuries now) has finally begun to affect the personality itself; for the belief that the most important thing about experi-ence is experiencing it, and about deeds the doing of them, is beginning to strike most peo-ple as naive. Doubtless there are still people who experience things quite personally...but this kind of people now usually appears ab-surd to the others, although it is as yet by no means established why."

This can quite easily be transported to the domain of art. The question is whether experience and action and the wishful dreams of men are all certified absurd and irrelevant - or whether, rather, the shoe now is on the other

Keeper of Man Ray's Sacred Flame

by Vicky Elliott

ARIS - The apartment looks onto the Luxembourg Gardens, where that gi-ant pair of lips hovered in the painting "The Lovers, or Observatory Time." An enormous, viscous eye, "The Witness," stares over from the other side of the room. Above the couch on a small geometric drawng, one of his last works, Man Ray wrote in a loping, childish hand: "Unconcerned, but not

Juliet Man Ray (born Juliet Browner, eldest of six children, in New York) has these remembrances. Her busband, "the compass reader of the unseen and the shipwrecker of the expected," as the Surrealist poet André Breton called him, died in 1976 aged 86, after a lifetime, 45 years of it in Paris, spent teasing photography into new territory and turning art on its head.

Juliet has been left in exile, a little lost, with a studin full of whimsical creations, to guard the sacred flame. Tiny and neatly made, tinier than one would ever believe from those statuesque nude photographs now on show in the Pompidou Center's collection of portraits, she loats around in her own space, a curly-headed wraith. She will not tell her age.

The current surge of interest in her hus-pand's work keeps her busy. She is fretful over the just-ended strike at the Pompidou Center that deprived the public of three weeks of a major retrospective, but she will be leaving soon for New York to attend the opening of an exhibition of photographs at the Zabriskie Gallery, only in return for another show at Marion Meyer's in Paris on Feb. 23.

She sits surrounded by the books, piles and shelves of them, that record her busband's achievements, and conversation is punctuated as she darts off to retrieve them, eager to share another of his practical jokes on the world; Man Ray: half-prankster, half-genius. There is a still life of fruit and red peppers on a wall. Look how sexy it is," she says with a little chirruping laugh that escapes at unpredictable intervals. "All those curves."

In "The 50 Faces of Juliet," just published in Italy from a dossier of portraits taken in the 1940s, she appears with as many faces as a pantheon of Greek goddesses. She has stepped right out of a bacchanal; there should be grapes in her hair. When Man Ray found her in Hollywood in 1941, according to his friend and biographer, Roland Penrose, she was a "girl with an enchanting personality, faunlike features, sparkling black eyes and a detachment that increased her exotic flavor." She was visiting a friend, on a weekend from New York, and on the dance floor she was "like a

Then she forgot about her career as a dancer she had studied with Martha Graham in New York - and went to live with Man Ray in an apartment on Vine Street, tucked away, amid palm trees and hibiscus, from the bustle

"We were absolutely relaxed," she says to-day, remembering the days in the 1940s when her busband painted through the day and they partied through the night. "There were always fresh flowers to put in my hair." Man Ray drove them around in the small but deadly automobile, "the Hollywood Supercharger," that he was so proud of — "he dido't like me to drive" - and Ava Gardner came to see them. Hedy Lamerr played chess and Gypsy Rose Lee ("she wrote mystery stories too, you know") invited them to parties.

In 1946, the inter Max Erist who h lived through the heyday of Surrealism with Man Ray, visited from Arizona with his fiancée, Dorothea Tanning, also an accom-plished artist. They asked the couple to be witnesses at their wedding, but having lived together for six years, the Man Rays decided they would take a more active part. The double wedding was to have been a quiet affair at City Hall "But Max looked so striking, bronzed with his white hair and all that Indian jewelry," recalls Juliet, "there were a lot of reporters around." It was recorded in Ernst's painting "Double Wedding at Beverly Hills."
In 1951, the landlord decided to double their rent, and the Man Rays took the last voyage of the "De Grasse" back to Europe. "Everybody played chess, and there was champagne after every meal," Juliet recalls, "but I was on Dramamine." Back in Paris, they began to pick up the threads that had been tan-gled during the war. The first problem was the choice of a studio, which was eventually found on the rue Ferou, a buge barnlike room lit en-tirely from above ("He did put in one window for me," says Juliet). They were soon enter-taining all the old friends: Marcel Duchamp, Paul Eluard and other players of chess.

There were other shades from Man Ray's eventful past. One day in 1952 they were sit-ting at a cafe, Juliet remembers. "Suddenly this apparition appeared and was hugging my husband. 'Mon petit Man!' she said." It was Kiki, his mistress in the 1930s, the peasant girl from Burgundy who sat for Foujita, Maillol, Kiesling in Montparnasse and whose naked back Man Ray turned into an iconographic symbol in his "Violon d'Ingres." Juliet went to see her on the rue Briare, not far from the new studio, "living with some sort of person who played the guitar." By now Kiki was dying, spent and weary. But he was always kind to her, even when they parted," recalls Juliet.

"He was no tourist, he didn't like to travel," she remembers. "But we would be invited in the summer, to Cadaques in Spain, with Marcel Duchamp — you had to be brilliant to un-derstand him." Salvador Dali, nearby at Port Lligat, would throw off his cloak of preten-sions in this intimate circle of friends, wearing the simple clothes of the local fishermen and adding earnestly to the weight of discussions. "He didn't play-act, he was very serious," says

Man Ray continued to work: "Photography was easy for him, very easy. He never studied but he could do everything." Painting, his first love, came easily too. "He worked simply, with no ceremony," says Juliet. His source of inspiration, his unstoppable sense of bumor, never went dry. "He didn't want to be bored."

Juliet berself fueled his imagination. There were the curves of "Romeo or Juliet," one of his series. "Shakespearian Equations" based on a textbook explanation of mathematical principles; there was the fulding screen, "Les 20-Jours et Nuits de Juliette," that nnw dominates her sitting room. Man Ray once divided it up like a chessboard into 40 black and white squares, when she was away in the south of France for 20 days and 20 nights.

There was the painting "On With the Dance," also banging in the room that looks over the Luxembourg Gardens, where she moved from the studio in the "frightening period" just after his death. "He's a very good dancer," she says abstractedly, leaving the present tense to stand for itself.

Juliet sometimes liked to paint, "But Man" Ray didn't like the idea of his woman being a painter," she says simply. "And I wasn't that aggressive." His slogans were liberty and pleasure and for him, women had their own role to play: "Seduce the whole world, like the rising sun!" said the poet Breton, inspired by Man Ray's work in the album "Photography Is Not Art." "Failing that, never grow old."

The photographer Berenice Abbott, whom Man Ray met when she was sculpting in New-York and who became his assistant, once complained: "His portraits of men were good, but he always made women look like beautiful objects. He never let the force of their personality as such come through." But in those photographs of women, and not least in those of the person with whom he shared more than 30 years of his life, be left a vision that was a feast, a celebration. "The 50 Faces of Juliet" captures strength and beauty in a single moment, forever. "We were all so young then,"

David, the Noble Roman

by Edith Schloss

OME - After the last flourishes of the baroque and the decorative case and meanderings of rococo — pictures overflowing with garlands of bodies and vegetation, palaces and churches where the elements of structure were camouflaged with dazzling illusion - a grand surfeit and reaction were bound to set in.

The painter Jacques Louis David, born in Paris in 1748, at first vowed to keep faith with such immediate predecessors as Fragonard with whom be decorated the Guimard Palace. Traveling to Italy, however, he was soon seduced by the masters he discovered in Parma and Bologna and then was impressed by those he found in Rome. But the sight of the freshly unearthed ruins of Pompeii was the true turning point: The soberness of Roman republican buildings, the majesty of the antique con-firmed David's inner attitude and philosophies, and led him to an entirely new way of painting. He became the main exponent of

He had to try four times before he won the Prix de Rome in 1772, allowing him to study and work in that prestigious institution the French Academy in Rome, under the patronage of the king — an absolute necessity for the career of an aspiring French artist. Though the five-year stay in Italy molded him, the ambitious David gladly went back to Paris for commissions.

One of the most coveted, with a theme set by the king, was for the Salon. After exhibiting there several times, he set out for Italy again in 1784 convinced that only there could he execute the ordered "Oath of the Horaces," which was in become his most significant picture Somberly dramatic, constructed with exemplary plainness, it is of a moral, exhorting nature, a lesson in civic virtue: The cold splendor of neoclassicism deals with patriotic sentiment at the expense of private feelings at a high point in history, with public behavior, the sacrifice of the individual in obedience to the rules of the establishment. Solemn and de-

David, often criticized for chosing only historical subject matter, was eventually over-come by an upheaval of his own time, the French Revolution, which, using a terminology based on Roman republican ideals, provided him with the theme for his most memorable canvas, the shattering "Assassination of Marat," his noblest work.

In David's pageants and friezes great naked limbs, extended from drapery in large unmistakable gestures, predominate. It is the extremities that speak, the energy of arms and legs that signify the meaning and conduct the tragedy. Faces are secondary, only conventional masks of resolution, horror or grief.
We can see this best in the "Horaces," where arms and the stance of muscular legs are all directed towards the crisscross of swords, the symbol of the protagonists' fate, the limbs so accented that they become exclamation points, abstract elements of the structure of the com-

In "Marat," stabbed to death in his own bathtub - who but David could have transformed such banal surroundings into such an cloquently simple setting? — again it is the arm of the murdered man in the immediate foreground that tells everything. Hanging earthward in a loose curve, the hand still holding the quill, it is a most horribly useless m-

This seems to be the age of padded one-man shows in Italy. First Antonello da Messina, then Kokoschka, then the ill-balanced De Chirico show — all so-called retrospectives with fewer and fewer works and greater and greater attendance because of media fanfare, leaving those familiar with the artists' work unsatisfied and confusing those with bitle previous knowledge. David and Rome, the show at the French Academy, Villa Medicis, Trinità dei Monti I until Feb. 28 is no exception. Without the reasoning of the catalog, the visi-tor is confronted with an odd array of David's minor paintings, few testifying to his real power, and some secondary oils by his rival Peyron and his follower Dronais. There are first the still rather rococo compositions that did not win him the Prix de Rome, and the winning picture itself, followed by oils executed in the academy for the annual shipment back to Paris. Of these a nude commonly named "Patrocles" already shows a considerable change: A fleshy man sitting on the ground with his back to us is rendered with a realism that is clearly Caravaggiesque. In "San Rocco Praying for the Plague Victims" also from Rome, the emphasis is not on the saints but on the unholy sick, languishing in the fore-ground, gruesomely realistic. However, the equestrian portrait of Count Potocki is an amusing throwback to rococo.

"Belisarius," painted in 1780 to get entry into the Salon, and "Andromaque" for the 1783 Salon itself, are then definitely in the new manner of historicism at its most theatrical Alas, of the great "Oath of the Horaces," the most important work David did in Rome, we are offered only a small preliminary oil sketch
— the canvas is supposedly too awkward to bring back here from the Louvre.

Then there are many drawings, copies of an tique statuary and views of Roman streets and palaces, which are just studies, with an agitated rococo composition bere and there. Finally the "Assassination of Marat" here is only a copy of the original in Brussels, if by David's own hand, and does not seem to be quite up to his greatest achievement, the pitiless represen-tation of a man's absurd and irrevocable fate. Such an able painter would, of course, also paint respectable portraits when asked to do

But a self-portrait at the time when David vas active in the revolution is illuminating: It is of the face of an intelligent, nervous man in casually arranged clothing, studying himself and the world with a lucid stare and a lofty intensity. It was Delacroix who said of David's work that it was "an exceptional combination of realism and the ideal."

Geisha Supply Running Short

by David Lammers

OKYO — Japan's geisha associations are quietly searching for more young women who can sing folk songs, dance and conduct lively conversation with hysinessmen at parties.

The average age of Japan's geisha is now about 40, and there is a shortage of apprentices, according to Shigisuki Uetsuki, acting director of the geisha association in Asakusa, one of Tokyo's oldest entertainment quarters. Asakusa, with its lantern-lit streets, was home to about 200 geisha in the years after World War II, he says. Today, about half that many women belong to the Asakusa geisha association. One authority estimates there are no more than 2,000 "genuine" geisha in all of Ja-

The postwar geisha were in the old tradition, recruited in girlhood from poor families and apprenticed for many years in the teahouse arts — playing the twanging, three-stringed samisen, dancing in close-fitting kimono and singing Japanese folk songs in the proper sort of cracked, wavering voice. But Japan's increasing prosperity and the enthusiasm of its youth for more modern lifestyles means fewer girls are drawn to a career that means long training, diminished prospects for marriage, an irregular income and bittle lifetime job security.

Most recruits now are in their late teens or early 20s. Uetsuki says. Many become geisha after finding other occupations unsatisfactory.
"Aguri," one of Asakusa's newer, and most popular, geisha at the age of 24, joined the geisha world 15 months ago after a short and uneventful career working in an office.

"My mother enjoyed dancing and playing the samisen, and I began Japanese-style dancing when I was 6. But when I told my mother and friends about my intention to become a geisha, all of them were very surprised," she Interviewed after a Saturday afternoon samisen lesson, Aguri radiates enthusiasm for her new career. "To be able to work playing musical instruments and dancing, it's more than enjoyable. It's great," she says.

The Asakusa geisha association requires her to attend two dance lessons and one samisen and drum practice session each week. Three times a month she studies the ritual tea cere-

Beginning geisha are expected to buy a new set of kimono each month, which devours most of the $2,090 or more that a popular young geisha can earn. Individual customers or restaurants that cater parties can request Agun's services. Like most geisha, she lives with several others. The "elder sister" of the house guides and advises the younger women in their training and work. Uetsuki explains that geisha such as Aguri, who combine artistic skill, a lively personality and physical beauty, are in demand throughout the year. The older ones, although more skilled, often can obtain daily work only during the monthlong New Year's holiday period, Many women leave the trade to marry while belief that geisha are prostitutes, rather than "classical entertainers," exists even among тапу Јарапе Despite the difficulty in finding new recruits. Uetsuki is optimistic that the decline in geisha numbers may have leveled off. Six new seisha entered the Asakusa group last year, and two the year before. He notes that more young Japanese businessmen are hiring geisha

GENEVA — Western delegates expressed strong reservations about a United Nations effort to help Third World countries process more of their own raw materials.

They told a UN Conference on Trade and Development subcommittee in Geneva Thursday that preliminary studies on the idea were in part inaccurate and probably impractical. But Third World delegates insisted the subcommittee had done enough research and should begin drafting the outline of an international agreement to help poor countries process and market their goods.

Although processing and marketing would bring developing countries more money than selling raw goods, tariff barriers, restrictive trade practices and multinational corporations, hinder this, conference studies say.

"We believe the failure of many developing countries to develop an attractive investment climate is perhaps the most important obstacle to their increased participation in these fields," U.S. delegate Donald Phillips said. Magdy Hefny, the Egyptian representative criticized what he said was the increasing dominance of multinational companies in the processing and marketing of Third World raw materials. multinational companies in the processing and marketing of Third World raw materials.

McDonnell, Fokker End Pact to Build Airliner

ST. LOUIS — McDonnell Douglas said Friday that it and Fokker of the Netherlands have terminated their agreement to design and possibly produce a new 150-seat airliner because the current economic problems of world airlines have severely curtailed demand for new aircraft. The two companies signed a memorandum of understanding under which they have been working since May on the proposed airliner McDonnell Douglas said it will continue design work on a 150-passenger airliner and will continue to discuss joint venture possibilities with potential partners. It added that it will also continue to work on derivatives of its DC-9 and DC-10 jetliners.

Kaiser Steel Finally Agrees to Bid by Hiller Group

Los Angeles Times Service

LOS ANGELES — Kaiser Steel said Thursday that it has agreed in principle to be bought for $55.25 a share by an investor group that it spurned twice last year. A final agreement, which may involve a price of $414 million, would conclude four months of buy-out ettempts by a group headed by San Francisco area investor Stanley Hiller Jr.

The struggling steelmaker rejected an offer in December only $1.25 a share, or about $8 million, lower. But a Kaiser spokeswoman said, "There was so much uncertainty in the customers' minds about who is going to be the owner of the company in the near future . . . [that] it was just so difficult to conduct business in that kind of atmosphere."

CII-Honeywell Blames Loan Costs for Loss

PARIS — CII-Honeywell Bull, which is expected to be nationalized, said Friday that 1981 results were severely affected by the sharp rise in borrowing costs and the need to obtain considerable financing to fund its growth.

The enmpany, a 47-percent-owned subsidiary of Honeywell Inc., earlier announced a net group loss of 430.1 million francs ($7.19 million) for the year, compared with a profit of 180.2 million francs in 1980. The company said that as a result of being seriously under-capitalized, the group was forced to finance most of its growth with loans at high

Tin Squeeze Seen Forcing LME to Play Waiting Game

LONDON — The London Metal Exchange will find it hard to intervene more directly to restore or-derly trading in the tin market unless there are no offers of immediate delivery, LME dealers said Friday. Uotil such offers dry up, a market cannot be called a corner, they said. The bulk of readily available tin remains in the hands of the buyer who has dominated the tin scene for the past seven months.

And unless there is a sudden and unexpected influx of metal to I MP's warehouses in Farrone, the exchange's attempt to restore orderly trading could easily backfire, they added.

The major buyer, widely be-lieved to have links with Malaysia, oow probably holds physical stocks of tin equal to world surplus production for several years as well as U.S. surplus tin sales.

Dealers said this "individual" needs only to sit back to obtain a £120 a ton per day penalty from sellers unable to fulfill their sales contracts to "him" instead of openly trading at daily rates, which hit a record Friday of £8,990 a metric ton. At the end of last June the price was £6,350. The withdrawai of tin from circulation means merchants and consumers are having to compete actively for limited supplies on the LME, the world's only open market for the metal.

A key problem is that the physical stocks are not held by an LME member and therefore only moral pressure can be exerted on the holders of tin to help the current squeeze. But the record prices have caused many tin consumers to defer deliveries and even to lend any spare stocks they hold, traders

The delivery problems have been accentuated this month by delayed shipments from the United States where international traders bought U.S. surplus strategic stockpile tin to fill their commitments on the LME. In addition, tin production, in Malaysia, the world's largest producer and exporter of the metal, slipped in December from November, the government said, though it gave no reasons for the decline. Meanwhile, forward prices are being left far behind the dramatic rise in spot metal. The three months quotation fell £5 Friday to show a discount of £945 a ton on the cash price. This compares with less than £600 a ton following the LME's move Tuesday to limit the penalty for deferring delivery and £150 in June.

DEARBORN; Mich. - Ford Motor Co. will post a loss "slightly in excess of $1 billion" when it officially reports its results for 1981 later this month, according to a company executive.

Peter J. Pestillo, the company's vice president for labor relations, made the disclosure late Thursday in response to an inquiry from the United Automobile Workers union. Ford currently is engaged in negotiations with the union, seekmg to exchange assurances of ater job security for wage and benefit concessions.

A $1 billion loss for 1981, which would be generally in line with the expectations of financial analysts, would indicate that Ford lost about $286 million in the fourth quarter of the year.

In the first three quarters of the year, the company had a cumulative loss of $714 million. Ford is to report its fourth-quarter results in a few days.

The 1981 loss, when sales were down 6 percent from 1980, comes after a $1.5-billioo loss in 1980 and weekend bargaining on possible cost-saving concessions by the UAW. The Associated Press reported. Prices Gain on NYSE; Money Supply Drops

NEW YORK - Prices oo the New York Stock Exchange, bolstered by strength in airline issues, closer higher Friday. Trading was active as investors expected the money supply figure to show a de-cline of about $2 billion to $6 biltion when it is released after the market's close.

Later the Federal Reserve reported that the basic measure of the mocey supply known as M-1 fell $1.4 billion to $447.6 billion in week ended Jan. 27, after seasooal and benchmark revisions. However, a New York Federal Reserve Bank spokesman said the M-1 decline would have been $3.2 billion if the effects of new seasonal adjustment factors and revisions to include data from small banks had been excluded.

The stock market traded in a narrow range the morning but began to firm in the afternoon. The Dow Jones industrial average elosed up four points to 851.03 after being up more than six points earlier. Advances led declines by more than two to one as volume approximated Thursday's 53.30 illion shares.

Analysts said the market has been particularly concerned about the money supply because of fears that the Federal Reserve could tighten monetary policy further to stem recent strong money growth.

They said the market sustained a rally that began late Thursday when the Dow index ocared the 840 level and found considerable support among professional investors. An improvement in the bond market in the afternoon aided the stock market, they added.

News that unemployment de-clined slightly in January from December's level, while imexpected, had relatively little impact, the analysts ooted. They said the decline could at least partly reflect technical factors.

Stability Expected In Price of Gold

Ressers

ROME — World gold prices are likely to fluctuate in a fairly narrow range this year but may turn higher toward the year end if industrial countries adopt reflationary policies, speakers told an international gold conference Friday.

Guido Hanselmann, Union Bank of Switzalland executive vice president, said he saw a range this year of $350 to $450 an ounce, arouning present economic conditions show little change. But he added that the price could go lower if Western economics plunge deepar into recession.

Gold closed at $384 an ounce in London Friday.

Gold closed at $384 an ounce in London Friday.

Mr. Hanselmann said the price is unlikely to rise above the higher end of range unless governments, and the United States in particular, adopt reflationary measures, which he felt is unlikely before the end of the year.

Paul Jeanty, Samuel Montagu & Co.'s man aging director, said he sees a medium-term untrend for gold, which could be accelerated the event of a rise in inflation rates.

Mr. Hanselmann told the conference the demand for gold in the past year has be maintained by an increase in Japanese buyis stimulated by the relatively low price of go in yen terms. This increase is likely to continuand demand can also be seen from the cent banks of OPEC countries, which curren hold less than 2 percent of their office reserves in gold.

Some selling may be seen from a few cent banks, such as Portugal, which hold a disp portionately large amount of gold within the reserves, he added.

Japan Sees U.S. Action On Rates of Currencies

TOKYO — Japanese Finance Minister chio Watanabe said Friday that he believe United States has recently started to coops with other countries on foreign exchange kets, but he did not say whether the Urstates has intervened.

He told a news conference that the Urstates will join in concerted central bank it vention on foreign exchange markets with pan and West European countries over easier rate fluctuations or speculation. In scircumstances each country would carry concerted intervention, he said, adding "United States is also included."

Later in the day, U.S. Treasury Understary. Beryl Sprinkel denied that the Urstates had such intervention plans.

On Asia Funding After U.S. Offer

PARIS --- Donor countries of the Asian Development Fund failed to agree on new capital resources for the fund when the United States Development Bank President

Masao Fujioka said. The fund, a subsidiary of the bank, lends money to the poorer Asian developing countries among the bank's 44 member nations on concessional terms. After a meeting Thursday of the 17 developed donor countries, Mr. Fujioka said the fund would make "one last attempt" to agree on new resources at a meeting in early April, proba-bly in Washington.

The fund's management has proposed a $4.1 billion third replenishment of its resources to cover the four years from the start of 1983. The United States faces stiff opposition in Congress to any increases in foreign aid.

Lockheed's Hopes Grow for Threatened Unit

By Bill Sing

Los Angeles Times Service
LOS ANGELES — When Lockheed announced last December that it would phase out production of its L-1011 TriStar jetliner and added that it might have to suspend output of its P-3C Orion anti-submarine aircraft, company officials were worried.

Lockheed President Lawrence O. Kitchen had warned in a letter to the Navy that the possible job and work losses would put the viability of the firm's Lockheed-California unit, which produces both planes, "in great jeopardy."

But Lockheed officials now are saying that reports about the demise of their second-largest unit were premature. Lockheed's largest unit is its missiles and space subsidiary.

In addition, Chairman Roy A. Anderson said that Lockheed several years may pursue diversification into other lines of business, made possible by improved cash flow resulting from the dropping of the loss-plagued TriStar pro-

YORK - Nike Inc., which did not exist 20 years ago, has become a major factor in an industry that has stymied a lot of companies: Marketing specialty

Part of Nike's secret is that, unlike many other shoe enterprises, it does not spend a lot of money on factories. Instead, it buys shoes from South Korean and other forcign manufacturers.

In addition to keeping its capital investment low, Nike limits its inventory risk by taking orders from retailers under a five-month "futures" program that accounts for nearly 60 percent of sales volume. nearly 60 percent of a retailer orders early to get a guaranteed price and the assurance that he will receive 90 percent of his order within a two-week peri

These methods have catapulted Nike into the big leagues with sales estimated at $665 million for the fiscal year ending May 31. In fact, Nike is so big that skeptics are asking whether the game is already Dennis Rosenberg of Oppen heimer & Co. thinks not. He notes that Nike also sells branded athletic apparel, in competition with Adidas, and is still in the relatively early stages of penetrating that market.

Meanwhile, Nike is making a major effort to become a bigger factor in the European and Japanese markets.

What impresses Nike's fans is its vigorous growth in both sales and earnings over the last five years. Sales should be 45 percent higher in the current fiscal year than they were a year ago, and earnings may! rise 87 percent to $2.85 a share. Nike earned $1.52 a share last year, and next year Mr. Rosenberg is looking for $3.60 a share.

Sophisticated investors are especially impressed by Nike's high return on equity. That measure was 46.4 percent in the fiscal year 1981 and is expected to be about the same this year. By comparison, the average return on equity for industrial companies is about 15 per-

NORMALLY when confronted with a new book on the stock market, I tend to dismiss it on the ground that if the author really knew enough about the market to write a useful book, he wouldn't have to bother. But the authors of these two volumes intrigued me with the ebullience of their titles.

How can they be so sure there's going to be a stock-market boom in the 1980s, especially when the market has been as listless as a three-toed sloth, and supply-side economics seems so far to be producing the Great Bust of the '80s?' The most obvious reason why Charell and Cobleigh and Dorfman can be so sure about the coming bull market is that it is sufficient unto their purposes to be so sure, or at least to seem so sure — their purposes, being essentially to ensuare greedy book reviewers like me and other acquisitive readers. But by the time I allowed this truth to penetrate, I had read enough to learn that the authors read enough to learn that the authors have other, slightly less illusory, reasons for predicting a boom.

Ralph Charell — the writer of "How I Turn Ordinary Complaints Ioto Thousands of Dollars," and two other books about money — is a stock technician. That is, he is a stock analyst who believes that all you need to know about a publicly owned compaoy is in the patterns that amoear when oy is in the patterns that appear when the prices of its securities are charted.

Simple as That

As a chartist, he is particularly sensitive to the fact that the market for securities goes up and down. As more money goes in and out of the market faster and faster — a phenomenon that has been occurring lately, for various reasons - these up-and-down swings are bound to get more and more extreme. Ergo, there's going to be a big bull market sometime in the 1980s. It's as simple as that.

And when it comes, you ought to buy low-priced stocks, because, among other reasons, it's easier to double your money with a stock that costs $4 than it is with, say. Eastman Kodak, which now costs around $70. To figure out when to buy these lowpriced ones, you need only spot individual up-turning stocks at the instant of the general market's upturn. You figure out these turning points by recognizing various chart patterns. Simple as that.

Ira U. Cobleigh and Bruce K. Dorfman - who have written a number of books together and apart - agree with Charell that the market is going to go up and down in the future, more and more dynamically. But as fundamentalists instead of technicians that is, believing that "stock prices are the slaves of carning power" — they also see concrete reasons why the market should go up more than down in the 1980s. Among these reasons are the future health of the U.S. economy and the adjustment of future stock prices to past inflation. These are just two of many factors that they feel could raise the Dow Jones industrial average to above 3,000 by the end of oext year, and send carefully selected stocks, both low-priced and high, crashing through the dome of heaven.

It's all as simple as that — except if you have been following closely and are now wondering which stocks you ought to buy to ride the rampaging buil. Or even how you should go about locating those stocks. Ralph Charell advises to buy the low-priced ones that chart correctly; but because there must be 7,000 or 8,000 low-priced stocks available through the various stock exchanges on the North American continent, one would either have to subscribe to a forbiddingly expensive charting scrvice or spend more hours than there are in a day tediously drawing charts of one's care of one's own. Fancy Schemes

This failure to arrive at the crucial point is typical of Charell's scatter-brained text. He gets so lost while jumping around — from fancy schemes on how to hedge in a bear market, to rather vague and far-fetched advice on how to put off having your profits taxed - that he even ends up forgetting the optimistic spirit of his title. In a late chapter called "The Waves of the Future," he suggests that the Dow could go as low as 42 in the 1980s. In other words, his book could just as easily have been called, "How to Make Big Money in High-Priced Stocks in the Coming Bear Market."

Cobleigh and Dorfman are more forthcoming when it comes to suggesting stocks to buy. They actually list a number of companies one might want to invest in, dividing them up according to whether one is interested in growth, blue chips, income-producers, low-priced shares or mining stocks. Of course, they utter not a breath of recommendation, which is probably just as well, because most of the stocks they mention have gone down in the interval since they wrote their book.

Naturally, this hardly forestalls the possibility of a buil market in the 1980s. But it also does little to diminish my unfortunate prejudice: stock analysts who can, do; while those who can't, write books about the market.

Hess Wins Slalom For Third Victory; Cooper Is Second

By Nick Stout

New York Times Service HAUS, Austria - Erika Hess of Switzerland reacted like a champion at a tense moment in her slalow race Friday and was rewarded with her third gold medal of the World Alpine Skiing Championships. Christin Cooper of the United States was the runner-up and now holds three of the five medals won so far by the American team. Danicla Zini of Italy was third.

in the men's combined event, meanwhile, Michel Vion of France took the gold medal when he imished Friday's downhill in ninth place. He had been fourth in the slalom half of the event. Peter Luescher of Switzerland won the silver medal and Antoo Steiner of Austria won the bronze.

Hess, 19, who has also won the giant slalom and the combined event, appeared to lose her balance shortly after starting the morning half of the two-run slalom race Friday. She slid wildly but quickly re-gained her balance and skied so perfectly the rest of the way that only Maria Rosa Quario of Italy was able to beat her morning re-

Too Far Backward

"I was probably too oervous," Hess said, explaining that she lost control because she was leaning too far backward. Having recovered, she said, her confidence for the second run grew because she did not believe that Quario would be able to handle the pressure. "I knew she wouldn't the nerves." Hees said.

Quario wound up in fifth place, behind Dorota Tlaka, one of the 18-year-old Polish twins who have attracted attention on the World Cup tour this winter because of their frequently good results.

Hess has now assumed the world championship in the three events won by Hanni Wenzel of Liechtenstein in the 1980 Olympics. She needed to ski in more races to do it, however, because at Lake Placid the combined was a paper race. Here it was a separate

Lendl Overcomes Flu, Scores First Defeat of Connors United Press Internati

TORONTO - Ivan Lendl, on the verge of defaulting in mid-match because of the flu, held on to score his first victory over Jimmy Connors and gain a semifinal berth in the Canadian Challenge tennis tournament. Lendi broke Connors' erratic service five times Thursday night to take a 6-4, 6-3 decision. In other matches, John McEnroe clinched a semifinal berth in the round-robin event by beating Vitas Gerulaitis, 7-6, 7-5, and Roscoe Tanner beat Adriano Panatta, 6-2, 7-5. Andrej Kepinski, the tournament director, said Lendl called him on the court before the first game of the second set and said that because of persistent flu symptoms he was considering withdrawing. I said, Well, that's your decision, "Kepinski said.

Lendl had not beaten Connors in eight matches on the sanctioned tournament level. His victory, because it was in a special eight-man event, will not be official. The others playing here are Peter McNamara, who has also qualified for the semifinals with two victo-ries, and Eliot Teltscher:

Not That Difficult

'lt was not that difficult, really," Miss Cooper said of the first run, in which she was third. "Bot it was early and cold and maybe people weren't warmed up enough. It was very icy and the snow was tricky.

Asked for her assessment of Hess, to whom she has finished second often over the past two winters, Cooper said: "Great. Consistent. Strong, Precise. Even when she gets into trouble, she lets her skis run."

Hess won the race by 33 hundredths of a second over Cooper, who was second in the giant slalour and third in the combined. Zini was only three hundredths of a second farther behind. Two of the top men downhillers, meanwhile, have had serious acci-dents in training that could affect their performance in the premier event of the championships on Sat-urday. Steve Podborski of Canada fell twice during a training run Thursday and badly bruised his hip and shin. Franz Klammer, the most popular of the Austrians, wiped oot Friday and was briefly hospitalized with a bruised rib, a light consussion and injuries to his knee and leg. He was spending Fri-day evening packed in ice at the Austrian team hotel.

For the record, the downhill half of the men's combined was won by Conrad Cathomen of Switzerland who was followed by Todd Brooker of Canada and Michael Mair of Italy. But these results are largely unimportant, except for how they affect the skiers' overall computerized ranking in the world.

Don Perry

From Saginaw to Big-Time Hockey, One Tough Character

By Gordon Edes

Los Angeles Times Service LOS ANGELES - Friend or foe, the consensus oo Doo Perry, the Los Angeles Kings' coach, is that he is one tough char-

John Brophy, coach of the minor-league Nova Scotia Voyageurs, counts himself among Perry's friends. That was not always the case. Brophy has the memory of a jaw fractured by Perry when both were playing in the Eastern League.

"He was the toughest hockey player I've even seen," said Brophy, whose own listic exploits were considerable. "He was the champ, without a doubt. A heavyweight ... I stayed away from him. Perry's reputation did not diminish during his 17 years of coaching minor league hockey, a world where machismo is a matter oot so much of ego as of survival. Perry has been coach of the Kings for less than a month, but he is already a figure of controversy in the Naconal Hockey League. He has received a 15-day suspension from the league for ordering a player, Paul Mulvey, to leave the bench and join toughest team in the league physically." O'Brien said, "and it was accented by some notorious minor-league goons.

Saginaw's most intense rivalry, O'Brien said, was with Toledo. "They'd start their brawls during the last four chords of the National Anthem," O'Brien said. "The organist would still be playing and the guys would start swinging away."
O'Brien recounted two incidents. One happened during a bench-clearing brawl in Dayton, when Perry left the bench and fought at center ice with Jim (Serweed) Pettie, the Dayton goalie, who had been harassing the Saginaw players. "Pettie ripped Perry's sports jacket in that one."

The other occurred in Kalamazoo, on a rare occasion when Saginaw was the intimidated rather than the intimidator.

"Perry was so upset at his players,"
O'Brien said, "that before the third period began he came out to the bench and grabbed a stick. Every time a Kalamazoo player skated by [in the warmup] he would swing at that player. They were laughing at him. Finally the referee saw him and he was immediately ejected. But I don't think he was ever fined or suspended."

It was a time, O'Brien said, wheo "goon hockey was the norm, during the heyday of the Philadelphia Flyers. And in these type of cities, blue-collar towns, it would League when Perry was coaching the Sagionaw Gears.

There was one occasion, on April 13, 1980, in Saginaw, when it did not go over at all — at least not with the Milwaukee Admirals, who forfeited a playoff series with Saginaw after a brawl that left Milwaukee players seriously injured and resulted in lawsuits from both sides.

A S2-million suit filed by two Milwaukee players, Carey Haworth and Michel Bergeron, contends that the fighting was oot the spontaneous kind usually associated with hockey but was part of a premeditated plan to intimidate the Milwaukee team

Haworth got a fractured cheekbone and two black eyes and needed 15 stitches after fighting Saginaw's John Gibson, who later played with the Kings and oow is with the Toronto Maple Leafs.

Nothing Like It

"I've been in hockey many, many years ... but I've never seen anything like what occurred in Sag'naw," said Lloyd Petut, the Milwaukee team owner and loogtime adcaster for the Chicago Black Hawks. Wren Blair, who owned the Saginaw team before declaring bankrupiey last year and oow is the Kings director of player personnel, wrote in The Hockey News shortly after the incident that he couldn't believe the public furor.

"My God, it sounded worse than when Hitler invaded Poland." Blair wrote in an article entitled "Hockey Without Fighting

The image of Perry's teams being fit solely for combat is an unfair one, his defenders say. When he left New Haven last month to coach the Kings, "the team was in first place and had 268 fewer penalty minutes than any team in the league," said Roy Mlakar, the New Haven team president.

In addition, the Saginaw team that last season won the Turner Cup, the IHL equivalent of the Stanley Cup, was among the bottom three in penalty minutes.

"He's always had a good forechecking club and skating club," Brophy says. "He's always kept a few tough players, but he didn't have goon hockey clubs."

And even if his teams were rougher than most, that wasn't a had quality, according. 10 some associates.

"He's an honorable guy, an honest y," said Ted Garvin, who formerly coached in Toledo and now coaches the Flint Generals. "He's like I am; he likes tough hockey players ... and I assume Don is trying to instill to the L.A. club that they've got in play physically like that in order to be successful. Whether that style can be successful, or, be appealing, in L.A. is questioned by Milwaukee Coach Phil Withiff.

"The game is changing," he said. "You can't sell that kind of hockey anymore. It's almost a status thing to be anti-fighting. Guys like Doo Perry, who say they like that rough-tough hockey, they're in a mi-

In Rugby, the Attack May Be Back

By Bob Donahue al Revold Tribune

LONDON - More than many sports, rugby is alert to its history. Right now, the international rugby community senses a moment of transition, a watershed.

This weekend everybody at Twickenham and especially at Cardiff will know — players, adminis-trators, fans, even the rugby pil-grims from Japan and America who arrive every year at about this time — that the old days of open, running, flowing, attacking rugby are on their way back.

The third and fourth matches of the annual Five Nations Championship bring Ireland to England and France to Wales. (Scotland is idle after holding England to a 9-9 draw in Edinburgh three weeks ago.) It is hard to recall a championship Saturday preceded by more excitement than this one,

The new era has been taxing along the runway in starts and stops for several seasons. Signs are that the takeoff is for 1982 at last - if not Feb. 6, then in the weeks immediately following.

In the classic pattern of the game, forwards fought for posses-sion of the ball and backs attacked with it. Backs, and especially threequarters, were the stars. But the 1970s were a decade of concentration on the training of forwards. who began bogging the show.

Servile Halfbacks

Increasingly, servile halfbacks would run close to their forwards, or kick the ball back in front of the the threequarters. Or the forwards would keep the ball and try to gain ground themselves in tightly sup-ported charges. When a center did happen to get the ball, he would most likely angle his run inward so as to link with his forwards.

Wings scored 15 tries in the 1971 championship but only 11 in 1975, and the decline continued: 9 in 1976, 7 in 1977, 5 in 1978. As the threequarters progressively saw less of the ball, their confidence and skills declined. Backs were picked for their tackling rather than for attacking talent. Half-backs became punters and placekickers above all. The penalty goal, rather than the try, increasingly determined victory.

When the star Welsh backs of the mid-1970s faded, it was mainly the Scots who kept the running game alive. Then England ran the ball in its matches against Scotland in 1980 and 1981. Australia, in a three-month tour of the Brit-Isles that ended early last month, attacked systematically but could not win the big matches, Two weeks ago, Ollie Campbell, kicking flyhalf by reputation, switched the emphasis to attack and made three tries for Ireland's wings against Wales. It was only the second time in the champion ship in more than six years that one team's wings had scored three tries. The Welsh were whipped,

A Revolutionary Team

On Jan, 27, France announced a revolutionary team for its opener against Wales. Thirteen of the 15 announced starters are from clubs in the Southwest, bastion of the running game that made France the attacking rugby country par excellence a geoeration and more ago, Cross-Channel telephone lines were busy with calls asking who some of these unknown players were — a big 20-year-old Dax flyhalf named Jean-Patrick Lescarboura, a center from Bayonne named Patrick Perrier, a 21-year-old Dax fullback named Marc Cardiff is the place where the trouble winning, so selection of the teams to play there every other year is usually conservative. Yet this time seven of the starters will be appearing in their first championship match. The explanation: France has decided to attack.

The four-sided picture for Saturday looks like this:

• England is in trouble. Veteran captain Bill Beaumont is out with a occk mjury and scrumhalf Steve Smith leads the team for the first time. Placekicker Paul Dodge tore a hamstring in training Thursday

John Scott returns at No. 8 after surgical repair of both ankles, but with little recent match experience. Phil Blakeway's return at tighthead is an asset if this often-in-jured prop can go the distance.

England started as the likely champion bot has been losing that aura steadily since its tryless draw with Scotland. The English have home advantage, and the Irish are unlikely to work up as much fire at Twickenham as they did at home the Mets' signing Foster to a new contract, would reportedly cost them two players — Alex Trevino, a backup catcher, and either Jim Kern or Ed Lynch, both of whom are pitchers. Foster, 33, is expected to demand $1 million or more a year before giving his agreement.

European Skating Title Won by West German The Associated Press

petition. The early leader, Jean-Christophe Simond of France, finished second, and Igor Bobrin of the Soviet Union was third. The competition was briefly interrupted before Bobrin's program

Wales a flash in the pan? Unlikely, but the English defense will be stiffer than what the Welsh managed. All four Irish threequarters are inexperienced.

Last year most commentators favored the Irish to win the cham-pionship, but instead they lost all four games. They will ren unknown force until their first away victory since 1976. · Wales is on the ropes. The Dublin fiasco was the sixth consecutive loss away in the champion-ship, a Welsh record. In their last six championship matches the Welsh have scored only four tries while allowing 12, and it is hard to see how the return of Ray Gravell, defensive center, increases the scoring potential. In another defensive switch. Clive Burgess and Rhodri Lewis return on the flanks. Gareth Davies, the captain and star flyhalf, has recovered from the thigh injury that took him out of the Ireland match in the second half, but veteran lock Geoff Wheel is out with a broken nose. His replacement, 6-foot-6 Dave Sutton, adds height at the lincout but is unlikely to match Wheel's ballwinning power in the tight situa-tions. The whole team is under heavy, possibly stifling pressure to defend Wales' unbeaten record at home in the championship, which goes back 27 matches to 1968.

· France has nothing to lose. Captain Jean-Pierre Rives is back after recovery from shoulder surgery in July. The front-five forards should be solid in the scrums; but with only ooe tall lock. Alain Lorieux, opposite Sotton and Richard Moriarty, the middle of the French lineout looks weak. Possession lost in the air will have to be recovered on the is unlikely to be dull.

ground. The Welsh, heavily criticized at bome lately, will be fierce. Remarkable cohesion (from No. 10 to No. 15, the backs are all from Basque clubs, and three of the threequarters play together in Bayonne) plus upstart confidence could compensate for inexperi-ence. The French public expects both his punting and his leadership in attack, which is a large order. Win or lose, this French team is unlikely to be dull.

NEW YORK — Rick Kuhn, a former Boston College basketball player, was given 10 years in prison Friday by a judge who said he hoped the stiff sentence would keen other athletes from bribery and point-shaving schemes.

"On final analysis, deterrence emerges as the most important sentencing objective." U.S. District Court Judge Heary Bramwell said after rejecting a plea from Kuhn's lawyer for leniency. Kuhn, 26, was convicted Nov.

Nashua Is Destroyed at 30

The Associated Press LEXINGTON, Ky. - Nashua, one of the great thoroughbreds of the 1950s, has died at 30. The stallion, who won the Preakness and Belmont in 1955, was humanely destroyed Wednesday because of age-related complications.

23 of conspiracy to commit rack-eteering. His 10-year sentence is to be served concurrently with the maximum five years each for conspiracy to commit sports bribery and for using interstate facilities to further a crime. He could have received 20 years on the racketeering-conspiracy charge. Kuhn was convicted with four others of conspiring to fix the point spread of at least six games during Boston College's 1978-79 season so that their betting syndi-cate could beat bookies' odds. The former reserve forward and at least one other unindicted play-er were paid $2,500 for each game in which they shaved points. Another defendant, Paul Mazzei, will be sentenced Feb. 12. As he did on Jan. 22 when he sentenced the other three, James Burke and brothers Anthony and

from four years to the maximum

20 years, the judge emphasized the scheme's oegative impact on college athletics. Their crime has reminded millions of sports fans that athletes can be compromised," he said. "Every college athlete may now come under suspicion from .coaches and fans."

I didn't know about it until I read a recent report by a Reagan commission which investigated fraud and mismanagement of the country's oil and gas reserves.

What happened to my royalties?" you may be asking.

No one rightly knows, and if he or she does they're not making a big deal of it.

This apparently is how the system worked. Every once in a while when someone at the Interior Department had nothing better to do, he would call up one of the oil companies which had a lease on public land and say, "What's up?"

The oil company executive would say angrily, "What are you doing, checking up on us?"

"Of course not. I was just curious how much oil and gas you were taking out of the ground?

"We're lucky to get three cups a day," the oil company executive would reply. "It's really tough drilling on public land. You never know when you are going to hit a

"Don't you have any idea how much oil and gas you hope to take out of the ground? "Look, when we signed your lease, you put us on the 'honor system' and made each us responsible for our own reporting. When we know how much oil and gas we took out, we'll tell you."

"Don't get mad. We're not questioning your figures. But Congress says we're supposed to keep tabs on you people, and any figure you could give us is acceptable." "I should hope so. The honor system is as sacred to the oil indus-

"It's a very complicated procedure. We have a guy who sits on a stool next to the well and he counts how much oil or gas comes out, with a pocket calculator. Then he turns those figures over to the foreman who subtracts any oil that spilled into the ground. The foreman sends these figures to the home office for verification.

"And what happens to them then? "The home office decides how much we should report to the government."

"That seems a fair way to do it. Are we allowed to audit your fig-

"Sure you are, but that would mean you didn't trust us, and then the whole honor system would break down. Is that what you people want?

"You got any other questions you want to ask?" "No, you've satisfied me. Is there anything I can do for you?"

"Yeh, you could Get the American Indians off our backs. They think they're not getting their fair share of royalties, and they want to do away with the honor system." That's unforgivable. I'll talk to the head of the Bureau of Indian

E.L. Doctorow Time

By Christian Williams Washington Post Service

ASHINGTON - E.L. Doctorow comes down to breakfast at a hotel bere like the answer to his own question, the question every novelist asks: What would the world be like if I made it up, just made it up as I went along, history and likeli-hood and all, beautiful women, billionaires, forests and Mercedes Benzes

He's about 6 feet tall with a trim gray beard, 51 years old, lives in New Rochelle, N.Y., and Sag Harbor, N.Y., and some-times writes in a cabin in the Berkshires, alone, because it's easier for him to write "if there's absolutely nothing else to do."
What is it novelists do?

"Make it new," be says. In "Ragtime," Doctorow took historical personages such as Stanford White and Evelyn Nes-bit and Rheinlander Waldo and J.P. Morgan and reinvented them, brought them back to life for his own purposes. Before that, in "The Book of Daniel," he constructed whole new lives for the sons of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, the couple executed as Communist spies.

By the third grade Edgar Doctorow wanted to be a writer. On a bus through the arctic New York streets (he imagined the cold to be arctic; later, when he went to the Arctic and found imagination correct, he was secretly disappointed) he found himself next to a burly man wearing a cap. The man had lost the heel on his heavy shoe, exposing a semicircle of nail points.

"What're you looking at, kid?" the burly man said.
"Nothing," said Edgar. He did the man's lifa over in his mind.

"In Spain the shoeshine boys sneak up under your table at the case and rip them off with pli-ers," the burly man said. "Presently, they commence to sell you a replacement. There is now in the town of Salamanca in the dusty cafe of the plaza a boy with his face disfigured in the shape of that semicircle." With a swing of his foot the burly man demonstrated.

Edgar, who preferred to make up the universe himself, said

At 48th Street, Ernest Hemingway got off the bus and went up the stairs to Maxwell Perkins' office to examine his royalty statements. Ha liked the story he had told the boy, so he told it to Perkins, too. Then he told it to the girls in the office, and they were impressed.

Sometime later Hemingway returned to Salamanca. A shoeshine boy stole his heel. The novelist kicked him in the face with the exposed nails of his Fiction writers are "born liars," Doctorow has said. "But we are the only profession forced to admit it."

F.L. Doctorow mounted the podium at the National Press Club and spoke to the assembly in his bonor.

He said that Leo Tolstoy, at the height of his powers, had quit writing novels for 20 years be-cause he had lost faith in the ethics of his own talent. Novels were a waste of time, Tolstoy had decided. Better to pass out potatoes to the poor.

"Consider the passionate energy required of that loss of faith," Doctorow said. American novelists, he said, have never really believed their art could change anything. American audiences have always demanded that the "political" and the "literary" be kept separate. We accept them together only in foreign writers, just as this administration will support a strike only if it happens to be in Poland. Applause.

What do you think of the movie version of 'Ragtime?' somebody called out.

Doctorow feigned discomfort. Ears grew toward him across the hall. The suspense became palpable. In the middle of the andience, Sam Goldwyn sat with Evelyn Nesbit on his lap, nibbling at a large cheese held to his teeth by an obsequious factorum. But now Goldwyn waved the cheese away and leaned forward expect-

"I think it is a pretty good pic ture inspired by one of the really great novels of our time," Doctorow said, to loud laughter.

In 1980, Ed Doctorow went to the Canadian Arctic to watch birds with Peter Mathiessen, naturalist and fellow novelist. It was the first time Doctorow had been to the Arctic, even though he had written about the Arctic in "Ragtime," in 1976. In "Loon Lake," his hero is called Joe of Paterson, as in Paterson, N.J. Paterson, the town with only one T. Images of entropy, sludged rivers, gray rain. An entire image-history of a madeup man contained in the one word, the one-T "Paterson." E.L. Doctorow never lived in Pater-once," he said. The snow of the Canadian Arctic under Doctorow's feet was not flat and soft as in Central Park but rugged and hard, a great expanse of white broken only by the coming towers of nuclear submarines. But nevertheless the birds called to each other, and from below the sea ice was thumped by whales.

Across the frozen snowscape, pushing his beard before him like a cart, came Leo Tolstoy. In his bag, Tolstoy had a bottle of Tol-stoynichkaya, which he opened, and offered to Doctorow, who took a deep draft.

The smeset was huge, it sai on the sky like a pink sombrero settling slowly over the eyes of the world. J.P. Morgan arrived, and Henry Ford, and Emma Goldman reclining on a dogsled. They talked about many things, and Doctorow was pleased. He was nodding off when Harry Hondini jabbed him in the ribs. There's more," Houdini said.

Dropping by parachute from low-flying cargo planes, their skates illuminated by flares, came the entire Ice Follies cast, alighting in marvelous grace and in carefully prearranged routines. Doctorow could not help but grin.

"I thought you would like it,"
said Joe of Paterson, his smile illuminated by the sparkle of his diamond stickein.

Obviously it is not all strictly true. Obviously liberties have been taken. Obviously Doctorow will understand. He always thought you were supposed to make it up. But it is true that in the Arctic there is a Loon Lake, and that Mathiessen took Doctorow to see it.

Professor Doctorow, in "Loon Lake" commas are missing and words permute one into another. "They are phonetic connec-tions," he explained over breakfast, "Small variations in words guage.

"It's one of many directions a novelist can go at this point to make it new. We can't write novels the way they did in the 19th century anymore. We have televi-sion now. There's a lot of jumping and cutting in 'Loon Lake,' which is meant to be free associative, like TV when it goes from threatened wildlife to burning buildings to soap. We can accept staggering interruption now."

Nancy Reagan'a project to donate her free haute countre ensembles to U.S. museums was conceived by worried White House aides to minimize the public rela-tions damage the issue could cause the Associated Press report ed, quoting informed sources. White House sides were taken by surprise when Mrs. Reagan toki them a couple of months ago she had been getting the free clothes, according to an administration of-ficial. Her revelation came during a general White House review of gift policy following disclosures that National Security Advise Richard V. Allen had accepted wrist watches from Japanese friends. Allen resigned last month. When approached on the subject. the first lady reportedly asked innocently whether the clothes the has been given by designers would be covered. "I think it's fair to say that we saw it as a potential public relations problem," said the offi-cial, who spoke on the condition he not be identified.

Actor James Caguey and song-stress Ella Fitzgerald are Hasty Pudding Theatricals' man and woman of the year, officials of the Harvard University club an-nounced in Cambridge, Mass. Fitzgerald, whose jazz career goes back more than 40 years and includes 10 Grammy awards, will receive her pudding pot award at the Hasty Pudding theater on Feb. 17. The presentation will follow a parade with Fitzgerald through Harvard Square. The club then will perform a few scenes from its 134th annual production, "Sealed With a Quiche." Cagney, who was 8 vandeville song and dance man before beginning a movie career, will receive his award Feb. 24, the opening night of the show.
